Mr. MANN. Section 12 would protect it as long as it is in the original package, except for the fact that we have a law now upon the statute books regulating that particular question. Section 12 expressly provides against that proposition by excepting anything now covered by existing law from the operation of this act. So that we do not change the law as it now stands in reference to the shipment of whisky from one State to the other.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; but would not this section of this law be in direct conflict with what is known as the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, which we passed a year or two ago by almost a unanimous vote in this House?

Mr. MANN. It would, possibly, if section 12 did not contain this provision which the gentleman might examine——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have read it.

Mr. MANN (reading): "Except as may be otherwise defined by law or provided by statutes of the United States."

And as there is a statute otherwise providing in reference to whisky, that clause of the bill does not relate to the shipment of whisky from State to State, but is thus expressly excepted from doing so.

PROVISIONS AS TO PRESERVATIVES.

Section 9 of the House bill is a new provision in the bill, so far as the Senate bill is concerned in one respect, although it has been frequently covered in somewhat the same line of thought in other bills. It provides:

That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products for the guidance of officials.

It being evident that there must be some standard fixed for the guidance of officials in order that the same basis should obtain in all parts of the country.

But one of the great questions of the age in reference to food is the use of preservatives. There is a broad contention, on the one hand, that preservatives used in some amounts are not in any way injurious or deleterious to health. On the other hand, there is a contention that any quantity of salicylic acid or boracic acid or benzoic acid and other acids used as preservatives become at once a burden upon the system, which must cast them off, and that hence, any quantity used, no matter how small, is to the extent to which it is used an injury to health.

Your committee did not think that we knew so much, as yet, that we could determine that question; and we provided in the bill, not that the decision as to it should be left to one person, but that the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of aiding him in reaching a determination, at the request of any person interested to know whether the preservative if used was wholesome, should be required to call to his aid five experts, naming them, of different classes, who would be most likely to know from observation, experience, and experiment whether or not the use of the preservative is injurious to the health of the consumer.

We also provide in this section that in fixing the different standards of food the Secretary of Agriculture may call to his assistance the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists, and then, in addition to that board, shall call in the aid of the Association of State Dairy and Food Departments. The purpose of the bill, in our judgment, is largely to obtain uniformity in food laws throughout the United States.

In preparing and presenting the bill to this House we have had in mind not only the desire to control the shipment of food from one State to another which may violate the theory of the bill, but to prepare a bill which might be adopted by the respective States—adopted by both New York and Texas—so that the manufacturers of the country might know that the law was the same. We believe that if we have a food law which shall prove satisfactory that the States themselves will desire to adopt the same provisions, so that we may have in our complex form of State and national governments similar laws, both national and State, throughout the country. And believing that it was desirable, in order to reach this end, in fixing the standards of food, we require that these State health officers and food officers should be consulted, because after they have helped to fix the standards of food their States are much more likely to adopt and accept those standards.

PROVISIONS AS TO NARCOTICS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is another provision in the bill. When the bill came to the House from the Senate it contained no provision in reference to narcotics. We inserted in the bill a provision, as presented to the House, in reference to medicines, which of course includes what are called "proprietary" or "patent" medicines; that they shall be deemed misbranded if they fail to bear a statement on the label of the proportion or quantity of alcohol, cocaine, or other poisonous substance there is contained in the package. The committee have an amendment to that proposition to submit to the House. In the House bill we would have required a statement of the alcohol, for instance, in Pharmacopœial remedies which are definite in the Pharmacopœia as to their contents. It would be useless to require a statement of the alcohol or other medicines in those Pharmacopœial remedies, because they are accessible, and everyone can know exactly what they contain if they comply with the Pharmacopœia as required by the bill.

Then we thought that it would not be fair to require this statement, "or other poisonous substance which may be contained therein," after we had given the matter full reflection, both because no one knows what would be the definition of "or other poisonous substance," and also because there are various poisonous substances, in no way habit-forming drugs, the disclosure of which might require the person manufacturing them to disclose their full formula without any benefit to the public. We propose to offer an amendment, setting forth the names of the articles, so that we will provide that as to all of these medicines there shall be stated the quantity or proportion of morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any such substances contained therein; and I have collected, both through my own efforts and through the efforts of the committee, and I may say partly through the efforts of Mr. Samuel Hopkins Adams, of Collier's Weekly, a large number of instances, some of which I ask to put into the RECORD, showing where deaths have occurred by reason of these products being placed in soothing sirups and in other medicines offered for sale under various descriptions without anything to indicate the contents. There are medicines now upon the market, advertised in the strongest language which can be found, for the cure of the opium habit, which medicines themselves contain opium enough to give one the opium habit.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MANN. I always yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I have just received a telegram from a gentleman in Lafayette, Ind., insisting that the provisions the gentleman is discussing ought to go out of the bill, because he says it would be advertising these nostrums as containing opium, morphine, and other drugs of this character, which would tend largely to increase their consumption; in other words, that it would be an advertisement of drugs that people with morbid tastes are seeking. I should like to have the gentleman's opinion upon that proposition.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, of course there can be much said upon either side of that question. There is no doubt whatever that it will advertise the fact that the articles contain opium or morphine. Doubtless the gentleman who sent the telegram is in some way interested in the sale of the articles. We have had a number of suggestions of that kind made, coming generally, though not always, from people who wish to sell the articles, and who, if they believed it would increase the sale of the articles, would be the first ones who would want the advertisement on the label. We can not undertake to prevent the man who is an opium fiend from obtaining opium, but we can undertake to prevent the man who never wishes to take opium from taking it without knowing that he is taking it. [Applause.]

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield for just a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Oh, certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My purpose in asking the question was to get the gentleman's opinion upon that proposition.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe with the gentleman that the advertisement of such drugs probably will not increase their use, except among those already addicted to the habit; that it will not make any new opium or morphine drunkards, and will, perhaps, guard innocent people against a danger that they ought to be protected against.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, upon that very point, the Proprietary Medicine Association is a powerful organization, because it is the greatest advertiser that there is in the papers of the country. Some of the officials of the Proprietary Medicine Association are endeavoring and have been endeavoring for some time past in every way possible to prevent this provision going into the pure-food bill. We have been urged from every part of the country to support the bill as it came from the Senate. I read in the New York Tribune this morning a ferocious editorial against this provision of the bill, because it was not strong enough to satisfy the editor, and urging that we take the bill as it came from the Senate, although the Senate bill does not contain a word or a line upon the subject. [Applause.] Doubtless the New York Tribune was imposed upon, as other newspapers have been imposed upon. The physicians of my city sent me a petition requesting me to support the Senate bill, because that prohibited the use of opium and morphine, and urging me to have the House bill changed, because that permitted the use of opium and morphine.

Mr. Chairman, in the mail this morning I received, and I suppose other Members of the House received, a letter from Charles A. L. Reed, chairman of the committee on legislation of the American Medical Association, an association of the highest character and a gentleman of the best possible character, requesting us to support the Heyburn pure-food and drug bill. That is the Senate bill. Just why that letter happened to fall in here at this time I do not know. I do not believe it was inspired by improper motives on the part of the gentleman, although it refers to a resolution adopted in this city last January about the Heyburn bill then under discussion in the Senate, and in the same breath praised the Hepburn bill then awaiting consideration in the committee; still urging the Senate bill.

Here is a petition from the pharmacists protesting against the restriction which it was supposed the committee would allow of 2 per cent, or two grains, of opium to the ounce without putting it on the label. They say:

> We believe that the clause in the bill as it came from the Senate, providing for labeling certain medicines, is desirable.

And yet there is no such clause in the Senate bill; there is no such provision in the Senate bill. The only provision upon the subject is in the House bill reported by the committee to the House.

At the same time we have received petitions, and here is one from the physicians:

> While heartily favoring the pure-food bill as it came from the Senate, we respectfully protest against two amendments that we understand will be proposed in the House.

And they say that they understand there will be an amendment in the House allowing the habit-forming drugs to be sent forth without stating the quantity, and they do not wish that; but they wish the Senate bill, which does not contain a word on the subject.

Now, I give great credit to the Proprietary Association of America. Not daring to fight this bill in the open, not daring to say that they were afraid to state the quantity of narcotics in their drugs, they have falsified in some way about this bill and endeavored to give the country the impression that it was the Senate bill which provided for labeling the narcotics in drugs and that it was the House bill that proposed to strike it out, when, as a matter of fact, the Senate bill has nothing upon the subject, and it was the House committee that put it in. It might not be convenient for the Proprietary Association to oppose the proposition openly, because they passed a resolution favoring the strictest of legislation upon the subject of the use of narcotics, which resolution I ask to put in the RECORD:

Resolutions unanimously adopted by the Proprietary Association December 5, 1905.

Resolved, That this association thoroughly disapproves of any effort on the part of any persons or firms, members of this association or not, to market as medicines any articles which are intended to be used as alcoholic beverages, or in which the medication is insufficient to bring the preparation properly within the category of legitimate medicines.

Resolved, That the legislative committee be, and hereby is, instructed to earnestly advocate legislation which shall prevent the use of alcohol in proprietary medicines for internal use in excess of the amount necessary as a solvent and preservative.

Resolved, That the legislative committee be also instructed to continue its efforts in behalf of legislation for the strictest regulation of the sale of cocaine and other narcotics and poisons, or medicinal preparations containing the same.

Resolved, That this association urges upon its members the most careful scrutiny of the character of their advertising and of claims for the efficacy of their various prescriptions, avoiding all overstatements.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have already occupied more time on this subject than I desired to. Just a word on the subject of adulteration. Most foods are not adulterated, let me say. In our investigation, which has been quite extensive, we find that the great mass of the foods are not adulterated. In the greater number of the classes of food they are not adulterated. The greater proportion of the classes of food are not adulterated, and there has been since the pure-food agitation commenced a few years ago, and State legislatures passed acts upon this subject, a marked reduction in the quantity and number of adulterations in different classes of foods; and yet everywhere the honest manufacturer, the honest dealer, is met with competition more or less keen and dangerous by the use of adulterated or short-weighted goods.

The adulterations take a wide range. For instance, I give you a partial list of adulterations, as follows:

Food.	Color.	Adulterant.	Preservative.
Milk.	Annatto.	Water.	Formaldehyde.
	Azo colors.	Skimming.
	Caramel.		Boric acid, borax.
			Sodium bicarbonate.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. The gentleman speaks of the adulteration of olive oil with cotton-seed oil and the adulteration of lard with cotton-seed oil. Does the gentleman regard these adulterants as unhealthy?

Mr. MANN. Not in the slightest degree in the world, and there is no objection, I may say to the gentleman, to cotton-seed oil as a salad oil. It is fully as good, in the opinion of many people, but it costs much less than does olive oil, and the use of the cotton-seed oil would probably be increased several hundredfold if the people all understood that that was what they had been using. They might do it more freely if they could buy it for a much less price than they are now paying. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the gentleman, and, as I understand him, the bill prevents the mixture of cotton-seed oil with genuine olive oil without so stating. Now, does not this bill allow the blending of prune juice and such stuff as that with pure whisky without so stating?

Mr. MANN. It does not.

Mr. STANLEY. Does it not allow the blending of high wines with inferior grades of whisky without so stating?

Mr. MANN. It does not. I do not care to discuss with the gentleman the whisky amendment. There will be time enough in the House for that.

Mr. STANLEY. Very well.

Mr. MANN. The bill provides that any of those substances shall be marked "blended," "compounded," or "imitation." You can not sell under the bill cotton-seed oil for olive oil, and you can not sell colored ethyl alcohol for straight whisky, or vice versa, if the bill becomes a law.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is the label required to state simply that it is blended or mixed, or is it required to state the ingredients exactly and the proportion of each ingredient?

Mr. MANN. The bill does not require the quantity of the ingredients to be stated in blended materials unless, as we propose, in the case of narcotic drugs, but it forbids the introduction into any food of articles which are deleterious or injurious to health or which conceal the bad quality of the article. It does not purport to say that if a man makes a breakfast food partly out of corn and partly out of wheat he shall state the proportions of wheat and corn. That, of course, as gentlemen will readily see, would be absurd.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes; for a question.

Mr. STANLEY. Just for a question. I am listening to the gentleman with profound interest, and the reason I desire to ask the gentleman this question is on account of reading what I find in lines 20 to 24, on page 21 of the bill. I read:

> In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are compounds, imitations, or blends: Provided, That the term "blend" as used herein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substances, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman fails, after reading the first part of the paragraph, I am afraid, to appreciate its importance. "In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are compounds, imitations, or blends."

Mr. STANLEY. That must be on the bottle?

Mr. MANN. That must be on the package. As to what is the particular blend, as to whether you can put coloring or flavoring matter in the blend, is another question; but everyone is put on notice that the article is blended; that it is not an original article, because the package must contain the word "compound," "imitation," or "blend," and no one who desires to get the straight article, as my friend, I am sure, does wish to do—no one who desires the straight goods need be deceived, so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the liberty of suggesting to my colleague that what he has read there does not permit, even though flavoring and coloring is allowed, an imitation unless it is marked "imitation."

Mr. MANN. No; it does not permit imitation unless it is marked "imitation," and it does not permit stating the age of the article unless it is really true of that article.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman a question on this section the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] called attention to. On the top of line 21, page 3, referring to subdivision third:

> If in package form, the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated, in terms of weight or measure, on the outside of the package.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I will state that I will take that matter up a little later. I expect to discuss that question.

Speaking of the liquor proposition, I have here, for instance, a letter from one of the leading extract works of the United States—I hate to give them any advertisement—dated April 23, 1906, since the pure-food bill passed the Senate and since it was made an order in the House, telling how to make all kinds of liquors without any original liquor in them at all. It reads:

APRIL 23, 1906.

DEAR SIR: We beg to announce the opening of our extract department for the manufacture of liquors. We were fortunate in securing the services of a first-class chemist, connected for a long time with the leading extract houses in Germany and France.

We are bringing an entirely new line on the market that will enable every liquor dealer to produce liquors as good as the imported for a fraction of the cost.

We beg of you not to compare our extracts with essences handled by domestic essence and oil houses, as our extracts are made by distillation from the raw material, and will produce goods as good as can be produced by distillation only. All our extracts are nonclouding, and goods made with same will, even at low proof, remain clear.

Our extracts contain coloring matter, which is an entirely new feature in this country. Every bottle of extract contains sufficient harmless color to give the produced liquor the required color. For instance, to make 50 gallons crême de menthe, 55 per cent strong, take 27½ gallons proof spirits, 1 pound of crême de menthe extract, 15 gallons sugar sirup, and 7½ gallons water, and the 50 gallons crême de menthe are ready, equal to any imported, colored green, clear, and ready for bottling.

Every other liquor made with our extracts is made in the same simple manner.

There is another good feature about our extracts. The dealer saves considerable by making these liquors himself. For instance, if you want to buy a barrel of good-quality crême de rose, or rose cordial, you will have to pay at least $1.50 per gallon. Now, by making it yourself with our extract, see what it will cost you, 55 per cent strong, to 50 gallons:

27½ gallons proof spirits, at $1.30	$35.75
15 gallons sirup, at $0.50	7.50
7½ gallons water.
1 pound crême de rose extract	3.25
Total	46.50

One gallon costs $0.93, and the saving on this barrel crême de rose amounts to about $30. The same is true as to the cheaper grades.

We beg also to call your attention to another of our specialties, our different kinds of gin extracts. We have a few only on our list, but can make any desired flavor to equal any imported brand. Our "sweetened Old Tom gin" extract, something entirely new, will save the manufacturer 12 per cent spirit. Gin made with this extract does not need any sirup. With gin essence, which you have been using to make a sweetened gin, you had to make your gin 92 per cent strong and add 1½ gallons sirup to the barrel to get the desired sweetness, and the sirup will reduce the apparent proof to 80 per cent. With our "sweetened Old Tom gin" extract you can make your barrel 80 per cent actual proof, and the gin will have the desired sweetness and still show 80 per cent.

There is no extract that we are not able to make, but there are many we have not on our list. For instance, for Boonekamp and Angostura bitters it requires, besides the extract sold by us, another extract made from herbs and roots by the liquor dealer himself, and for which we gladly will give recipe.

We are competent to give advice on any question concerning liquors and whiskies and will gladly serve our customers.

We do not sell retailers. One pound of extract is needed for 50 gallons liquor, and we will mail recipe with every pound extract.

We are convinced that a trial with our extracts will make you a steady customer. Hoping to be favored with your kind order, we beg to remain,

Very truly, yours, ——— ———.

All colors are harmless and according to United States law.

Recipes furnished with every pound extracts purchased. Failure impossible.

All our extracts will produce nonclouding liquors, and same will be clear enough for bottling.

Any desired extract not on list can be made on short notice.

For instance, have Bonnekamp and Angostura bitters—

Who would have supposed there was an extract for the manufacture of Bonnekamp or Angostura bitters?

We are competent to give advice on any question concerning liquors or whiskies.

Here is offered a commercial brand of spirits, made of ethyl alcohol, with no whisky in it, with no genuine liquor in it. These are not the only ones engaged in the offering of adulterated articles. Now, I yield to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. I sought to interrupt the gentleman from Illinois when he had finished talking on the question asked him as to the second exception on page 21. I wish to ask if the gentleman intended to say that anything was expected to be labeled or branded as blended except to say it was a blend?

Mr. MANN. That is all. It is only required to state that they are blended.

Mr. ADAMSON. You do not give any details.

Mr. MANN. No details; and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the provision is not confined at all to whisky. The same provision applies to food products, a proper provision in reference to adulteration.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. From the reading of this bill—not carefully having read it—it seems to me that a man can not tell whether he is violating the law or not by reading the bill, and should have to wait until some rule or regulation has been established by the Department fixing the ingredients and component parts, so that a citizen may know when he is violating the law or not.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my friend that the man who wants to get near the dividing line may have to wait for a ruling of the Department when the question arises as to whether an article is deleterious to health or not, and it may require not only a ruling of the Department, but a ruling of the courts before it can be ascertained. But the man who wants to sell good, pure food or drink to the people of the United States can do it without fear of trouble under this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. It is a very nice and very proper sentiment, but——

Mr. MANN. That is the fact.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Of course it is, but the legislation is aimed at the man who does not want to sell sound and wholesome foods and drinks. When we come to prosecute that man we prosecute him for the violation of a rule issued by the Department, rather than prosecute him for a violation of the terms of this bill, and that being true, is there any trouble in the enforcement of the law on that line?

Mr. MANN. I do not think there is any trouble in the enforcement of the law on that line. The same matter of legislation is being enforced in the various States all over the United States. And, permit me to say to my friend from Kentucky, that the man who violates the law does not merely violate a rule, he violates an act of Congress, which defines what are adulterations and what are misbrandings, and the rule, like the fixing of the rate on a railroad, is simply carrying out a mandate of Congress, the law of Congress.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. We had a decision of the supreme court of my State making it the duty of the Pure Food Commissioner to denounce bologna sausage that had an amount of boric acid in it that was deleterious to public health. The inspector comes around and he denounces this sausage as containing a dangerous and deleterious substance. Well, the next inspector comes around and decides that same bologna sausage does not contain a sufficient amount of poisonous substance, consequently our court of last resort held that the law was too vague and indefinite and consequently could not be enforced, and I am seeking light along that line.

Mr. MANN. You have a very good pure-food law in your State and it is being well enforced, I may say. Now, let me proceed, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. If I understood him correctly, his interpretation of this bill is that it does not prohibit the sale of anything that is not deleterious to health providing it is properly branded.

Mr. MANN. In general terms that is true.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Well, now, take the case of oleomargarine. There are laws in most of the States, as there are in my State—Pennsylvania—that prohibit the sale or offering for sale of oleomargarine that is colored so as to look like butter or to imitate pure butter.

Now, suppose that oleomargarine is colored or mixed with something merely to give it color or effect, which is not deleterious to health or is not impure; what is the effect of this bill upon the law of our State on that question?

Mr. MANN. This bill, I may say to my friend, would prohibit the coloring of oleomargarine unless it is marked "colored." It would not prohibit the shipment of colored oleomargarine marked "colored" into your State.

Mr. COOPER of Pennsylvania. Then the effect of that would be, so far as articles in interstate commerce are concerned, to nullify the laws of Pennsylvania on that subject?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. Having it in the State, it could not be sold in the State except under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania.

On the subject of adulterations I have another letter here—and I do not propose to weary you very much with many of these letters, although I have quite a collection of them. Here is one dated "Middletown, N. Y., April 2, 1906." I forget whose district that is in. It says:

> Why not save money by making black pepper P. D.?
> "P. D." is "pepper deteriorator."
> We are sending by this mail under separate cover a sample of our No. 3 filler for your inspection. This is the material that is the dark particles in our No. 5 pepper P. D. This, mixed with equal quantities of bolted corn meal and the harmless coloring matter that we will tell you to use, will make the very best black pepper P. D. that you have ever bought. This is the way that our No. 5 is made, a sample of which is also sent in same package.

Here is a sample of it [illustrating by pouring out contents of package].

A MEMBER. Will it make you sneeze?

Mr. MANN. It will not make anyone sneeze. I will say to my friend that it is made out of ground olive nuts.

The letter further says:

> In making your own P. D. you save one-half of the freight charges, as you can procure corn meal in your city as cheap, if not cheaper, than we can. * * * We quote the No. 3 filler at $20 per ton in 5-ton lots.

[Laughter.]

Who would have supposed that black pepper adulteration was so extensive that men could afford to quote the "deteriorator" in 5-ton lots? The letter further says:

> Inclosed in the same package you will find a sample of our No. 2 filler that we quote in 5-ton lots. * * * We will give you the different formulas for making an exact match for either cinnamon, cloves, or allspice out of the No. 2 filler at a very small additional cost to the price of the filler. * * * A great many spice houses use our No. 2 filler as a P. D. for cinnamon, cloves, and allspice without mixing anything else with it.

Then we find upon examination that a very large quantity of the spices and peppers of the country are adulterated, not only the ground pepper, but I have a sample on the desk here of the pepper berries made out of tapioca colored with lampblack.

Mr. Chairman, you will notice a great many advertisements in the daily and other papers to-day which read something like this:

> Mocha and Java coffee, 22 cents a pound; value, 30 cents. We have always sold this coffee at 30 cents a pound. It is composed of Old Government Java and Arabian Mocha. We are taking a loss on it because we want to introduce it into more homes. We depend on its superiority to hold its place in your esteem.

Twenty-five per cent or more of the coffee sold in the United States is sold as Mocha and Java coffee. There were more than 1,000,000,000 pounds of coffee imported into the United States last year, and of that less than 2,000,000 pounds was Mocha and only 10,000,000 pounds was Java, less than 13,000,000 pounds of the two out of more than a thousand millions. But that 13,000,000 pounds of Mocha and Java have beaten all records and have amplified themselves more than anything else ever did in the world, because out of the 13,000,000 pounds there have been sold not less than 250,000,000 pounds of Mocha and Java coffee; at a price, mind you—the question would be the price—at a price twice what could have been obtained if sold under its true name. [Applause.]

According to the reports of the Bureau of Statistics there were imported into the United States of coffee for the fiscal year 1905, 1,047,792,984 pounds, valued at $84,654,062. Mocha coffee, or coffee imported from Aden, Arabia, is put down as 1,789,788 pounds, valued at $251,592. Java coffee imported from the Dutch East Indies is put down as 10,712,449 pounds, valued at $1,318,970.

This Mocha coffee was imported direct from Aden and includes the long-berry coffee, which has a pronounced Mocha flavor, is grown in Africa, but imported from Aden as Mocha coffee. All of the Mocha coffee above mentioned comes direct from Arabia, and in addition to this there are other coffees which are shipped to England and from England to this country. Coffees shipped to England are not included in the list of genuine Mochas, for they are tinctured with a suspicion of being mixed in London.

The total amount of coffees of all kinds imported to this country from the United Kingdom (Great Britain and Ireland) for the fiscal year 1905, was 4,709,783 pounds, valued at $497,989.

The amount of Mocha coffee imported from Aden for various fiscal years:

1901—1,595,047	pounds, valued at	$243,682
1902—2,688,285	pounds, valued at	377,352
1903—2,555,836	pounds, valued at	300,683
1904—2,147,379	pounds, valued at	259,545
1905—1,789,788	pounds, valued at	251,592

JAVA COFFEE.

Amount of Java coffee imported from the Dutch East Indies for the following fiscal years:

1901—9,404,025	pounds, valued at	$1,359,794
1902—9,945,396	pounds, valued at	1,312,410
1903—12,515,404	pounds, valued at	1,673,408
1904—11,730,352	pounds, valued at	1,388,325
1905—10,712,449	pounds, valued at	1,318,970

RIO COFFEE.

The bulk of our coffee comes from Brazil. For the fiscal year 1905 we imported from Brazil 820,259,995 pounds, valued at $64,136,008.

The standard coffee in the market and the one which is quoted in the New York market is No. 7 Rio, and there are said to be nine grades of coffee known in the New York coffee market.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour. [Cries of "Go ahead!"]

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield such time to the gentleman as he desires. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I find, Mr. Chairman, that I must hasten along.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask you one more question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Suppose I buy a carload of coal thinking it to be Jellico, and it turns out to be Bird's Eye. The generic name "coal" being correct, would the mistake made of using a different name be a violation of this law?

Mr. MANN. Why, Mr. Chairman, I do not know that we have gotten to the point where we consider coal food. I know I have heard of people eating it, yet I scarcely think we have got down to the point of classing coal as food.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I am not speaking about food, but I want to know if that is covered.

Mr. MANN. This bill only covers foods, drinks, and drugs.

Mr. RODENBERG. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RODENBERG. With what was this Mocha and Java coffee adulterated?

Mr. MANN. Most of the coffee that is sold as Mocha and Java is Brazil coffee; but there are a good many kinds of adulterations, I may say to my friend; sometimes made by the use of acids; some made of sawdust, ground, hardened, and soaked, and sometimes made by bread properly prepared, but, of course, the ground coffee is adulterated in a great many different ways.

AMENDMENTS PROPOSED BY OUTSIDERS.

Now, I have received—and I do not know how many Members of the House may have received—letters from various persons, honest in their belief, asking that certain amendments might be made to this House bill. I have had a number of Members of the House speak to me about the proposition, each one handing me precisely the same letters and amendments. I had a curiosity to ascertain, if I could, where these amendments came from, and we managed to trace them back to the Columbia Egg and Provision Company, of New York, a company which has been engaged in importing egg yolks into the United States, preserved with boric acid, but which company came in contact with the provisions of the law, and that proceeding was stopped at the port of New York and also at Chicago. They have provided for a number of amendments, which they ask the people to support, and they prepare a letter and a copy of the amendments for the different people to send to their respective Members of Congress, and the letter all ready to sign:

Provided a fair national pure-food law being a necessity, please promote the passage of the Heyburn bill, amended by the House committee, after it is further amended, as proposed by the National Food Manufacturers' Association, and present section 14 is completely eliminated.

They suggested a great many amendments, but particularly dwelt on section 14. It was section 14, as now enacted in the agricultural appropriation bill, with which they had come into contact in endeavoring to import from China a lot of eggs, broken, rotten, preserved from further spoiling by boric acid, and they had been shut out, and they were anxious for a pure-food law that did not apply to their business. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what methods they had to disguise the flavor of the rotten egg, so as to make it salable?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, these eggs were used for two purposes. One was to add to the color of oleomargarine, and the other was to prepare proper confectionery and baker's articles in the great city of New York.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We did not get it in our egg-nogg, then? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. LACEY. I was told in Alaska last summer that a miner on return to Illinois during the year before had his first fresh egg in a great while and said it tasted insipid.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman is he a regular licensed apothecary or doctor?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have borne the title of doctor, I will say to my friend from Tennessee, properly for some years. [Loud applause.]

ADULTERATIONS.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have here, which the House has already inspected, probably, a number of adulterated articles. Here is a bottle of cherries, originally picked green, in order that they might be firm, with the green color all taken out with acid until they were perfectly white, and then colored with an aniline dye which is poisonous in any quantity; and I have here a sample of the cloth colored with the aniline dye taken out of a similar bottle. I do not know whether it would kill anybody to eat all of those at once or not. Usually, I believe, they are taken one at a time. [Laughter.]

The gentleman referred to olive oil. I have here a quart of genuine olive oil, bearing the name of the manufacturer. Here is a can bearing the same name, purporting to be made by the same person, sold at the same price, but filled in this country, the whole thing a counterfeit, cotton-seed oil, and, by the way, a sample of oil which, I am informed, was used for a time and eaten with relish and great avidity by members of the Union League Club of Philadelphia. [Laughter.] Here is another package of the same sort, a counterfeit of the same name and the same company, also filled with cotton-seed oil. Here is a package containing machinery oil. And gentlemen will notice that the makers of these counterfeits not only succeed in reducing the quality of the article, but also the quantity. Both packages are the same size, one containing machinery oil, and probably half or two-thirds full, the other containing olive oil, an argument in reference both to quality and quantity.

PRESERVATIVES.

Mr. Chairman, the use of preservatives is a matter of some contest and controversy, but there is a class of preservatives about which there is no controversy as to their unhealthfulness. All through the country there have from time to time appeared advertisements of various articles for the purpose of preventing the deterioration of foods. Here is a bottle of so-called "freezem," intended to convey the idea that it would do the same work that cold storge would do in the preservation of meat or vegetables. But, although this article will, to a certain extent, preserve the meat or fruit or vegetables upon which it is sprinkled, it is injurious to health without question, being composed largely of sulphite of soda and red coal-tar dye. It has been used very extensively. One of the articles upon the table here which has attracted some attention is a sample of honey, in the preparation of which the acumen of man has really reached its highest point. The specimen is composed of glucose, but it still deceives by containing a bug or a bee. Who, when looking at the clear amber substance, which resembles honey in appearance, with a bee floating in it, would suspect that it never had seen the inside of a hive, but only came from the glucose factory?

PACKAGE AMENDMENT.

But, Mr. Chairman, I mean to go to the question of packages. A good deal has been said on that subject. Gentlemen this morning received in their mail a circular letter, purporting to be signed by Mr. L. A. Sears, president, and Mr. F. F. Wiley, secretary and treasurer of the Western Packers Canned Goods Association.

In the first place, I may say that these gentlemen, I think, are laboring under a misapprehension of the proposition which is presented to the House. We proposed a provision of the bill requiring that packages containing food articles shall contain on the outside of the article, on the label, a statement of the quantity of the contents; and we shall offer an amendment to the proposition requiring that the approximate quantity shall be stated at the time put up; providing further that all standard sizes recognized by the custom of the trade may continue to be used under rules and regulations to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Secretary of Agriculture. The latter part of that proposition is designed to permit the use of such size packages as many of the whisky bottles and other bottles that are used, purporting to contain a quart, but which in fact contain less than a quart; if they be properly labeled, designating the character of the quart it contains, and also permitting the use of the recognized sizes of canned goods, by stating upon the can the size that it is.

In the circular letter which came this morning the statement is made:

It has been said that the consumer has been imposed upon by the variation in the sizes of cans. We wish to state that there is no variation in the size of standard packages. The 1-pound regular, etc., size packages are made from a standard scale, fitted down to the thirty-second of an inch.

I have here a number of samples of packages varying in size, all sold for the same contents. It is true that the cans are not marked 3-pound, or 2-pound, or 1-pound. No can in the trade is so marked, but they are sold that way. They are advertised that way. Here is an advertisement, taken from the Boston Sunday Herald of May 6, advertising 2-pound can cherries, 2-pound can raspberries, 2-pound can blackberries, 3-pound can baked beans, 3-pound can pork and beans, and various other articles named likewise.

Here is an advertisement from a Chicago paper of 3-pound cans California peaches, 3-pound cans California apricots, and various cans by pound weight, both fruit and vegetables, etc., and we have collected a large number of these advertisements from all over the United States. This morning I went into one of the leading grocery stores of the city of Washington, if not the leading one, and asked in reference to the size of these cans, and not a clerk on the floor of the grocery store knew even that these cans were not actually 2 and 3 pound cans instead of being only standard-size cans.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. What is the point of the advertisement? I do not quite understand.

Mr. MANN. We have a provision in the bill requiring that in some way we shall be able to indicate to the public and to the consumer either the quantity or the size of the can. These cans are advertised as 3-pound cans, and the one that I have in my hand is advertised as a 3-pound can and was bought for a 3-pound can of tomatoes. Here is another bought for a 3-pound can. I place them in the balances, and you see that one is much heavier than the other.

Mr. KEIFER. I understand that you have a provision in the bill that requires the labeling to show the size of the can or the contents by weight. I find a clause on page 21 which says that if the quantity and size of the package be incorrectly stated in terms of weight or measure——

Mr. MANN. The committee have recommended an amendment striking out the words that the gentleman has quoted and inserting the following:

If in package form, the approximate quantity of the contents of the package at the time put up be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package: Provided, That the use of particular sizes of packages established by recognized custom of trade may be authorized and permitted by and in accordance with rules and regulations established from time to time under the provisions of section 2 of this act.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did I understand the gentleman's amendment to make use of the word "approximate?"

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If that provision of the bill is enacted into law, how much of a variation from the actual weight or the actual measurement would the word "approximate" permit?

Mr. MANN. Well, I can not answer the question of the gentleman. I do not know how much variation might be allowed; that would be a matter for the judge and the jury to determine. If they were, upon the evidence, satisfied that the man had endeavored to put in the full amount, he would not be convicted; if they thought he was deliberately putting in a less quantity, he would be convicted, and he ought to be convicted, for a violation of the law.

Mr. POLLARD. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the 2-quart can and 3-quart can——

Mr. MANN. Three-pound cans.

Mr. POLLARD. As I understand the bill as it will be amended by the amendment recommended by the committee, the manufacturers can either state on the outside of the can the quantity by weight or measure. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. That is correct.

Mr. POLLARD. It seems to me that would meet the objection of the canners, would it not?

Mr. MANN. I wish to be perfectly frank with the House. The objection of the canners to this provision of the bill would not be raised at all, in all probability, if the canners made their own cans; but, in the first place, the canners buy their cans. I am informed that nine-tenths of the cans in the country are made by the tin-can trust, or whatever name it has. They are regular sizes, as a rule; they have been known to the trade for a long time as No. 1 tall, 1, 1½, 2, 2½, 3 in size. The public considered, and the trade—not the men who sell and possibly not the men who buy, but the clerks in the grocery stores and the country merchants—consider and sell these for so many pounds, according to the size.

Now, if everybody did that, if they were all alike, it would not make very much difference; but I say to gentlemen, here I have two cans of tomatoes, neither one weighing 3 pounds, and each one is sold for a 3-pound can. One of them weighs 2 pounds 5½ ounces and the other weighs 2 pounds 9½ ounces, and here is one that weighs 2 pounds 10½ ounces. Now there is a quarter of a pound difference. Who is entitled to say that the consumer who buys these cans can tell which is the heavier by looking at them or by handling them, and is not swindled when he does buy them? He is buying 2 pounds 10½ ounces, and pays a price for which he receives 2 pounds 5½ ounces.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. If you required in the bill that they should stamp on the can that it contained not less than 3 pounds, why would not the purchaser be entirely protected?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] can hardly make a valid criticism in that respect. The "approximate" quantity is sufficient, I may say to the gentleman, when we examine it, and I will say to the gentleman I have yet to find a single package of any kind of goods that exceeded the quantity that it purported to contain.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Illinois tell the committee how he proposes to remedy the evil that he spoke of a while ago about the anilyne cherries? That seems to be a pretty dangerous dose.

Mr. MANN. We forbid the use of those adulterants in the bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How? What language is used as to that?

Mr. MANN. The first is the adding of deleterious substances, and the second is the adding of anything which conceals the inferiority of the article. Either one of those would cover aniline dyes.

Mr. NORRIS. Referring to those cans which the gentleman weighed a few minutes ago, and of which he gave us the weight, I want to inquire whether or not under this bill the word "approximate" would not let all those cans in? Would anyone be liable on account of the sale or because of that word?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I say that "approximate" clearly would not permit a can purporting to contain 2 pounds and 10 ounces to contain 2 pounds and 4 ounces.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us get up to the 2 pound 10 ounce can. You are very near up there, and where are you going to draw the line?

Mr. MANN. We can not draw the line at an exact point, and we appreciate the fact. We do not endeavor to say that every can shall contain exactly so much. In the first place, that is practically impossible, because even if the gentleman had the scales before him—the most perfect set of scales in the city of Washington—he could not tell exactly the weight of a can, measuring here, and then it would vastly increase the cost of canning, because most canning is either done by machinery or else perfunctorily done by men or women dipping the article into the can. It is manifestly impossible to state the exact quantity in the can; but we can require that at least within a reasonable degree of sizes the cans shall correspond, and then that they shall be fairly well filled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read a part of section 12 as the basis of a question which I desire to ask. Section 12 reads:

This act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State, nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States.

That is all right. I have no fault to find with that; but it then goes on—and I desire to ask the gentleman why this language should be in the bill and why there should be any effort to limit or attempt to limit the police powers of the State? The language is as follows:

But foods and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another so long as they remain in original unbroken packages, except as may be otherwise defined by law or provided by statutes of the United States.

Now, suppose, for example, that the State of Illinois or the State of Mississippi is not satisfied with this law as being fully protective of the health of the people, and the State has other provisions, cumulative and additional. Why should this bill attempt to limit the power of the State to protect its people under the police power of the State reserved under the Constitution?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think it does undertake to limit. Let me explain: The provision that is in the bill authorizes the transfer of original packages, complying with the provisions of this act, from one State to another. It does not authorize the sale of those packages in the limits of any State, but it frequently has arisen that different States have different food laws, and in fact now that is so in the State of Minnesota and the State of Wisconsin. The State of Minnesota has one pure-food law and the State of Wisconsin has another pure-food law. The article may be precisely the same. It must bear one kind of a label for the State of Minnesota and another kind of a label for the State of Wisconsin. If the article bearing the Minnesota label gets into the State of Wisconsin it is a misdemeanor, and if the article with the Wisconsin label gets into the State of Minnesota it is a misdemeanor, and, so far as the sale of the goods in those States is concerned, we do not wish to interfere.

But here is the city of Duluth and here is the city of Superior, side by side, one in the State of Minnesota and the other in the State of Wisconsin. The dealer of goods in Minnesota wishes to ship goods from Duluth to Superior, but if he carries goods in stock in Duluth to ship to Superior, he is subject to violation of the laws of Minnesota, and the purpose of this bill is to permit him to carry, in the original packages, in his store in Duluth, goods that comply with the law of Minnesota on one side and another package of goods that complies with the law of Wisconsin on the other, and then to permit him not to sell goods in Minnesota contrary to the law there, but to receive them into the State and to ship them out of the State. The only exception provided by the bill is in the case of liquor now governed by the statutes of the United States, and we do not wish to permit, under this bill, the shipment of packages of liquor in the original package into a State in violation of the law; that is now governed by the statutes of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will excuse me for interrupting him, but this seems to me to do that identical thing. If Mississippi or Maine, for example, do not want liquor brought in, this seems to me to secure the right to send it in anyhow. It reads this way:

But food and drugs—

And you have already defined food to include liquors—

fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another so long as they remain in original unbroken packages.

Mr. MANN. I say to the gentleman from Mississippi that that provision was not intended to affect in any way the law as it now stands. As I understand the law, without any act of Congress, you can ship into any State of the Union a package of liquor in the original package, but you could not sell it in the State, and we say we except the act of Congress known as the "Wilson Act," or other acts from repeal by this provision in the bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under other acts of the United States; under that language.

Mr. MANN. We were afraid without putting in that provision we might repeal to that extent the law which now forbids the shipment of liquor from one State to another, and we did not wish to repeal that provision of the statute.

Mr. WILLIAMS. One word further, and then I have finished. One reason I asked this question was because of this fact, which the gentleman will recognize, and while it might be true that under the present law original and unbroken packages can be shipped into a State, it is true only because Congress has remained silent upon the subject. Congress can prevent it whenever Congress chooses to do so.

Mr. PAYNE. I would like to ask the gentleman—the gentleman presented three or four cans of tomatoes, I think, and I would like to ask him if any of those cans were precisely the same size, but of different weight?

Mr. MANN. They are not precisely the same size.

Mr. PAYNE. I think I saw some cans there of fruit this morning which were precisely the same size, but differing very greatly in weight.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I have no doubt the gentleman thought they were the same size by looking at them.

Mr. PAYNE. I will tell you what I did. I put one can on top of the other and they appeared to be about the same circumference. I then stood them side by side on the table and they seemed to be the same height, and I came to the conclusion they were of the same size. Perhaps I am wrong, but they were of different weight. Now, is it not a fact that in putting the same vegetable into the same can of the same size they will get different weights in a can?

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman I have weighed myself at least several hundred or more packages of these articles in cans and I have found no substantial difference in weight of cans of the same size.

Mr. HINSHAW. Is that true of the olive oil and machine oil a while ago?

Mr. MANN. I am talking about these canned goods.

Mr. PAYNE. That is an astounding statement in view of what the canners say about it——

Mr. MANN. I know it is astonishing what the canners say about it.

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, well, I know some canners whose word I would rely upon——

Mr. MANN. I do not doubt their word.

Mr. PAYNE. As well as the word of any Member of this House, and I have great respect for the membership of this House, and they say that at different stages of the growth of vegetables the same quantity in a can may weigh a different amount—peas, tomatoes, etc.

Mr. MANN. Permit me to say to the gentleman peas are slightly heavier than water, very slightly heavier than water; that there is no substantial difference, there is hardly any difference, between a can of peas and the same quantity of clear water. Now, it is true that where fruit is put up and where peas are sweetened the addition of sugar does add somewhat to the weight of the sirup, but I have weighed hundreds of cans of sweet corn, being a pound and a half substantially gross weight every one of them, and where we find a difference in the weight of the can we find a difference in the size of the can.

Mr. PAYNE. If that is true that peas are about the same weight as water, what protection would there be to the consumer by requiring the cans to be of the same weight when one dealer might put in a few peas and fill it with water and the other fill it with peas?

Mr. MANN. That is practically true, I will say to my friend, and the consumer can tell whether it is filled with water or peas, but he can not tell by looking whether it is 2½ pounds or 2¾ pounds.

Mr. PAYNE. What good will that do him if the water and the peas weighed approximately the same?

Mr. MANN. Oh, he can tell whether it is peas or water. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] possibly misunderstands the purpose of the amendment as to cans. We do not desire to compel the canner to state the weight of the can, but we do desire that, if he uses a particular size of can, he state the size of the can and conform to that sized can.

Mr. TIRRELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman desires to ask me a question, but I will not allow him to read a letter.

Mr. TIRRELL. Only a few lines on this particular subject, to show that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is correct.

Mr. MANN. If it is short, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TIRRELL. It is from E. T. Cowdrey & Co., the largest company in Massachusetts. It says:

In the first place, in packing fruits and vegetables, there are certain sized cans used in packing same. Now, when these cans are filled they are packed with whatever substance is going into the cans, and as much of the substance is put into the can as possibly can be gotten into it, and a great many times in packing—we will say, for instance, canned spinach—at certain seasons of the year the same quantity of spinach will weigh a great deal more than spinach packed at another season; just so on all kinds of fruits and vegetables. A quart can packed with tomatoes sometimes, when packed full, will weigh 2 pounds 6 ounces, while the same can packed full of tomatoes sometimes will weigh 2 pounds 12 ounces. It depends on the condition of the material going into the cans.

Mr. MANN. It depends upon the accuracy of the statement. [Laughter.] Here is a statement coming directly from a man who has been circularizing Congress. What does he say in his communication to this House:

Often mistakes are made in properly adjusting the filler, and many short-weight cans go through. I wish to say, however, that all such short-weight cans are sorted out from the first-class grades of goods and are put into cheaper grades, which are sold at a very low price. In fact, all light-weight goods, though they be of a fancy quality, sell for very cheap prices, and people seldom pay more for them than they are worth.

Here is an admission by one of the leading canning companies in the country that they put up these short-weight goods. Do you know what they do with them? I will tell you.

I bought some cans this morning in the city of Washington, advertised for 5 and 6 cents a can—that would sell at the ordinary store for 10 or 12 cents a can—at a department store. These short-weight cans are sold by the department stores and the mail-order houses of the country. [Applause.] The mail-order houses advertise this size of a can at a low price. They buy these short-weight cans from the canners. The department stores in New York, in Philadelphia, in Chicago, and the other large cities advertise them. This gentleman, Mr. Sears, mentions that they are sold in competition with the little grocery stores in the cities, attempting to do a little business. [Applause.] Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that he can not distinguish—the cans being almost the same weight—that there is any difference.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. In size.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from New York said that he had examined some of my cans and found they were of the same size and of different weight.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The same size and different weight.

Mr. MANN. If there is any gentleman here who can not distinguish between the size of those cans then he has not as good an eye as the gentleman from New York ought to have. Here are three cans that have never been opened. I bought them at random from a store this morning, and had them sent up here. They all contain California fruit. I do not know which weighs the most. [After demonstrating on the scales, showing that one can weighed more than the other.] Now, does the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] think they are the same size? They are not.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman that no one can tell by throwing a can down on the scales, and one side going down, just how much it weighs.

Mr. MANN. We can very easily tell how much more it weighs. I will place a quarter of a pound weight on top of the can. That can contains a quarter of a pound less than this can [indicating]. Both sell for 3-pound cans.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did you buy them for that?

Mr. MANN. I bought them for that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Sold by whom?

Mr. MANN. I am not going to tell who sold them.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The grocer advertises that he sells 3-pound cans.

Mr. PAYNE. Not the canner, but the groceryman here in the city. Why do you not have some penalty against him?

Mr. MANN. I am not engaged in an onslaught against the canners of the country. I think they are engaged in a proper business. I do not desire that they should be required to change the size of their cans. These cans are of standard size. While they are advertised for 3-pound cans, probably the largest of them will contain 2 pounds 10 ounces. The smallest of them will contain much less than that.

But I think that the consumer is entitled to have marked on the can the fact that it is a No. 3 can or a No. 2½ can or a No. 2 can, and with that marked on that can the can shall conform in size to the mark that is on the can. I do not think the canners have any objection to that. [Applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. I hope the gentleman will not look so fiercely in my direction. I am generally in favor of the bill, but I want a bill that will support itself. I do not want anything that will ruin any industry in the country, or one that will injure any industry, and I presume the gentleman does not. Generally, I am in sympathy with the gentleman's bill.

Mr. MANN. If I look fiercely at the gentleman, it is because of my great affection for him. [Laughter and applause.] Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ADAMS. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word——

Mr. MANN. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. ADAMS. I am not going to make a speech, but I want to call the attention of the gentleman in all fairness to one thing. No honest man wants a short-weight can, and there are short-weight cans in this country. But there are some honest men in my district engaged in this business of canning. They are doing a perfectly honest and legitimate business. They write that the difference in the weight of beet, corn, and other vegetables at different developments in their growth is so great that in the same sized can there will be a marked difference in the weight; and for that reason, and that reason only, they object to a definite requirement as to the weight. Now, I want to say another thing here. I want to ask him in regard to the concluding paragraph of this class——

Mr. MANN. I can not yield to the gentleman for a speech, because my time must be cut off very shortly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield except for a question.

Mr. ADAMS. You provide in that paragraph the standard sizes which are now in use may be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, what would you consider, out of the numerous sizes used, which is the standard of the sizes which are now being used in the United States?

Mr. MANN. Oh, there are some short-weight sizes, so purposely, differing from the standard sizes. They are made purposely to contain a little less than the standard size. Here is a standard size. An honest canner would use the standard size and put in the full quantity in a package of full size. What we desire is to protect the consumer against the crook, the man who lives by his wits, who tries to defraud either by adulterating the goods or, whenever he gets out of that business, tries to defraud by short-weight goods. Now I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, the bill requires either that they shall state the weight or quantity contained in the can.

Mr. MANN. We cover that later by a statement in weight or measure, and then put in a provision which will allow the Secretary to permit the use of standard sizes by marking on them, according to the standard size, what it purports to be.

Mr. STANLEY. I am not differing with the gentleman at all. I simply want to get light. I want to ask the gentleman this question: As I understand him, the makers or manufacturers of these cans sell them to the canner as a certain standard size, under certain specifications, and if the canner would state to the public what the manufacturer of the can states to him, would not that be sufficient?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that if the canners say that about the size, as a rule the retail dealers do not buy them by standard size at all. Now I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Does the gentleman from Illinois know from his investigation that when the manufacturer makes these smaller cans he saves nothing by it? In order that I may make my question clear, unless there has been a very recent change in the can-making industry, the cans are made out of a sheet 14 by 22½. One of these sheets cuts two cans—tops, bottoms, and caps. To make any cans under that size saves nothing but a little scrap practically without value.

Mr. MANN. All I ask the gentleman to do is to compare the cans which I purchased in the open market and produced here. They are different sizes purporting to be the same size.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry to disappoint gentlemen, but this bottle which I hold in my hand contains vinegar, bought for a quart, supposed to be a quart, and sold for a quart. I pour it into the graduate which I have in my hand and you will see that it lacks about one-fourth of being a full quart.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MANN. I do not at present. I have almost finished, and I must decline to impose upon the House much longer.

There are a great number of so-called cereal foods. It is impossible to ascertain much about the contents unless there is some method provided. It is true that people can buy them or not buy them, as they please. It is also true that people must eat, and hence must buy some articles of food. Now, I do not wish to say that people shall not put up such food as they please or buy such food as they please. That is not the purpose at all. But what objection is there to stating the quantity of the contents?

Here are two packages of precisely the same apparent size. It is true that under the bill they might state the quantity in measure and not in weight. It is also true that if the quantity were stated in measure and not in weight, people would not buy it. Gentlemen can see the comparative cost where there is an additional weight.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They are not the same kind of food. One is rice and the other is oats.

Mr. MANN. I understand. While these packages are of nearly the same apparent size, one weighs a trifle less than two pounds and the other weighs half a pound gross. The material is all right. There is no objection to the size of the package containing only half a pound, but the person who buys these articles in the market is often led to buy by the size of the package when there is no weight stated upon it. What harm can it do the producer to state the weight of the package?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. No; I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. Here are two packages precisely the same kind. One of them is not marked. It weighs 2 pounds. The other is marked 2 pounds. It weighs a little less than 2 pounds. Why one is marked and the other is not might be a problem, but one is probably marked to conform to a State law somewhere and the other is not. Why should they not state the quantity on there, so that the consumer, in determining between the various kinds of food that he has, may know how much is food and how much is package. Here is a package supposed to weigh half a pound. It does, but the contents of it weigh a trifle more than a quarter of a pound. Nearly half the weight is in the wrapper of the package. I have no objection to people buying and paying for the weight of the package, but I think they are entitled to know whether the weight is in the food or whether it is in the package itself.

Here is a package also sold largely by weight, and three-fourths of the weight is not in the article, but in the package which contains it. That is perfectly legitimate if people know it, but what objection is there to stating upon the package the quantity of contents of it?

We have collected a great number of these articles, some of them marked to contain certain quantities and some of them not marked, but sold for certain quantities, and scarcely any of them come up to the weight that they purport to be. There are a few exceptions, and I am almost tempted to advertise them. We think there is no reason why the dealer or the manufacturer should not be fairly compelled to state, at least with reasonable certainty, the quantity of the contents, and then to put a reasonably pure article in the package, or else indicate that it is not a pure article. [Prolonged applause.]

I decline to detain the House further.

APPENDIX.

GERMAN LAW.

Under the law of Germany meat can not be imported which has been treated with any one of the following preservatives or any preparation containing the same, to wit:

(a) Boracic acid and its salts.
(b) Formaldehyde.
(c) Alkali and alkaline earth hydroxides and carbonates.
(d) Sulphurous acid and its salts, as well as hyposulphites.
(e) Hydrofluoric acid and its salts.
(f) Salicylic acid and its compounds.
(g) Chlorates.
(h) Dyes of all kinds, however, without prejudice to their use for coloring margarine yellow and for the coloring of sausage skins, in so far as this use does not contravene other provisions.

MEMORANDA OF BOTTLES EXHIBITED ON TABLE FOR USE IN MAKING LIQUORS FROM PURE ETHYL ALCOHOL.

Bottle of cognac oil, bottle of Scotch whisky essence, bottle of Irish whisky essence, bottle of bead oil, bottle of Bourbon whisky oil, bottle of rye whisky oil, bottle of ageing oil, bottle of caramel.

Bottle of 100 c. c. proof alcohol. To make Irish whisky add 3 drops Irish whisky essence, 2 drops bead oil, 2 drops caramel.

Bottle of 100 c. c. proof alcohol. To make Scotch whisky add 3 drops Scotch whisky essence, 2 drops bead oil, 3 drops caramel.

Bottle of 100 c. c. proof alcohol. To make cognac add 1 drop of cognac oil, 10 drops caramel.

Bottle of 500 c. c. proof alcohol. To make rye whisky add 1 drop rye whisky oil, 2 drops bead oil, 2 drops ageing oil, 7 to 10 drops caramel.

Bottle of 500 c. c. proof alcohol. To make bourbon whisky add 1 drop bourbon whisky oil, 2 drops bead oil, 2 drops ageing oil, 7 to 10 drops caramel.

Bottle of rye whisky. This sample of whisky is colored with a coal-tar dye, is only 66 proof, and is made of alcohol colored and beaded.

STATEMENT REGARDING CONVICTIONS IN VARIOUS STATES FOR THE SALE OF FOOD CONTAINING INJURIOUS SUBSTANCES.

It has only been possible to secure very imperfect information on this subject, as it is customary in the majority of States to report foods merely as legal or illegal in the published reports, and to give no indication of the manner of the violation of the law.

Of the foods mentioned below, a large number consist of milk and cream, which may enter into interstate commerce, but more frequently do not. A large number of prosecutions have been successfully conducted in North and South Dakota for the sale of foods chemically preserved and colored with aniline dyes. Both of these classes of substances are regarded as injurious to health in those States, and are forbidden by law. The prosecutions occasioned by them have uniformly resulted in the conviction of the defendant.

We have not full data regarding the enforcement of the Pennsylvania law, and the information given under that State refers only to prosecutions that have been conducted from December 15, 1905, to April 15, 1906. On June 6 to 9, 1906, nine dealers were prosecuted at Norristown, Pa., for the sale of codfish preserved with boric acid. Eight of the defendants plead guilty, and the other was convicted. These cases were intended as a trial of the law to a certain extent, preparatory to prosecution of a large number of cases for the same offense in various parts of the State.

In the appendix to the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for 1905 is given a brief tabular statement of the number of prosecutions and convictions for the violation of the food laws in the United States for that year. No statement is included, however, of the number of cases that were regarded as injurious to health, and no such data can be secured without communicating with the officers charged with the enforcement of the food laws in the various States.

FOOD LEGISLATION AND INSPECTION.

[By W. D. Bigelow, chief of division of foods, Bureau of Chemistry.]

The information in the following table was obtained from State and municipal food-law officials, as far as they could be reached. The inspectors whose work is reported are usually men of good judgment and considerable experience in selecting food samples, and only foods suspected were sampled; also only such samples were analyzed as seemed likely to show violations of law. Accordingly the table does not show the ratio of adulterated foods to pure foods on the American market. The great mass of high-grade foods is excluded from any calculation that may be made upon the figures here given. Unless otherwise stated, the report submitted is for the calendar year 1905. In several localities statistics are prepared on the basis of some other year than the calendar year, however, and in some cases the records for a complete year could not be obtained.

The time included in the report from San Francisco is for milk from July 1, 1905, to March 1, 1906, and for other foods from February 1, 1905, to March 1, 1906. The figures submitted by the State of Washington are for eleven months, beginning May 1, 1905, and ending April 1, 1906.

In Los Angeles, Cal., and Cambridge, Mass., the year for which statistics are reported closed December 1, 1905. The year for which statistics are reported from St. Louis, Mo., closed April 1, 1905.

In the District of Columbia, the Passaic, N. J., and the South Dakota State food-inspection work, the year closed June 30, 1905.

In Providence, R. I., the year covered by the statistics ended August 3, 1905.

But little chemical work is reported from Idaho, owing to the fact that the laboratory was being extensively repaired and could not be used. In Indiana the laboratory of the State board of health has been organized during the year, and is now in active operation.

This information was secured as a result of a circular letter which was sent to the officers charged with the enforcement of the food laws in all States and to the boards of health in all cities having a population of 25,000 or over. In some few cases no replies were received. In many cases, owing to a lack of appropriation, no attempt is made to examine the foods on sale in the markets other than by such rough tests as inspectors without chemical training are able to perform. In some cases no provision is made for a food inspector; in others no laboratory facilities are provided. Hence a considerable number of responses to the circular letter merely gave the information that no food samples had been examined.

The State and city offices making such reports are as follows: Colorado, State dairy commissioner; Florida, State commissioner of agriculture; Georgia, State commissioner of agriculture; Indiana, State board of health; Iowa, State food and dairy commissioner; Missouri, State dairy commission; New York, State department of health; South Carolina, State board of health; Tennessee, State board of health; Texas, State health officer; and the health boards of the following cities: Bridgeport and Meriden, Conn.; Kansas City and Wichita, Kans.; Newport, Ky.; Gloucester, Haverhill, Lawrence, Malden, New Bedford, North Adams, Quincy, and Taunton, Mass.; Kalamazoo, Mich.; St. Paul, Minn.; Joplin, Mo.; Camden, Elizabeth, Hoboken, Orange, and Trenton, N. J.; Elmira, Newburg, and Troy, N. Y.; Lima and Springfield, Ohio; Portland, Oreg.; Altoona, Chester, Johnstown, Newcastle, Reading, Scranton, Williamsport, and York, Pa.; Charleston, S. C.; Chattanooga and Knoxville, Tenn.; Fort Worth, Galveston, and San Antonio, Tex.; Tacoma, Wash.; Wheeling, W. Va.; La Crosse and Superior, Wis.

MEMORANDA CONCERNING VARIOUS ARTICLES EXAMINED FOR PURITY, IN EVIDENCE BEFORE THE COMMITTEE.

Bottle—Cinnamon filler, composed of ground cocoanut shells.

Bottle—Mustard filler. Wheat flour and turmeric. Cost $0.05 per pound.

Bottle—Filler for cayenne pepper. Ground wood, corn meal, and some coloring material. Cost $0.04 per pound. Pure kind costs $0.16 up.

Bottle—This is a sample to be used to thicken and preserve cream. It is made of gelatin and boric acid.

Bottle—Sample of alfafa seed. Picked out of raspberry jam.

Bottle—Ground cocoanut shells used to adulterate spices, pepper, and cinnamon. Cost $0.35 per pound.

Bottle—Ground olive pits, imported in considerable quantities for adulterating spices.

Bottle—"Freeze-em." Sample of "Freeze-em," which is a commercial preservative largely composed of sulphite of soda, and contains a red coal-tar dye.

Bottle—Sample of "Iceine," which is commercial preservative largely composed of sulphite of soda and contains a red coal-tar dye.

Can—Olive oil. 16333. This is undoubtedly a sample of genuine olive oil produced by F. Baruo & Co., of Lucca, and was sold for $2 a gallon. 2 pounds 2½ ounces.

Can—Olive oil. 16348. This can was bought in New York City; is an imitation of the one above, and was evidently filled in this country with cotton-seed oil.

Can—Olive oil. 16337. This tin and label are an imitation of second one above, although the trade-mark and the spelling of the name of the producer has been very slightly changed. The oil in this can is largely cotton-seed oil. This can was bought in Philadelphia for $0.45. These cans were probably filled in this country with cotton-seed oil. 2 pounds 1 ounce.

Can—Olive oil. 16332. This is also an imitation of third one above. This can has also apparently been filled in this country with cotton-seed oil, and was sold for $2 a gallon, the same price as for the genuine article.

Can—Olive oil. 16339. This sample is guaranteed to be pure olive oil of the finest quality and is practically all cotton-seed oil.

Bottle—Pure olive oil. Sample of oil taken from the custom-house, shipped from France, and labeled "Pure California olive oil."

Can—Olive oil. 16331. This sample is guaranteed to be pure olive oil of the finest quality and is practically all cotton-seed oil.

Can—Olive oil. 16335. Another sample claiming to be pure Italian oil and practically all cotton-seed oil. This can was evidently filled in this country.

Can—Olive oil. 16334. This is a sample of oil claimed to have been made in France; largely cotton-seed oil and sesame oil. Sold for $2.50 a gallon.

Can—Olive oil. 16341. Sample of oil claimed to be pure olive oil which contains a large amount of sesame oil.

Can—Olive oil. 16350. This sample was bought in New York City for $1 a gallon. It is olive oil of very low grade, probably machinery oil that has been purified in some way.

Can—Olive oil. 16351. This sample was bought in New York City for $1.08 a gallon. It is olive oil of very low grade, probably machinery oil that has been purified in some way.

Can—Olive oil. 16338. This sample is guaranteed to be pure olive oil of the finest quality and is practically all cotton-seed oil.

Can—Olive oil. 16336. This sample is guaranteed to be pure olive oil of the finest quality and is practically all cotton-seed oil.

Can—Olive oil. 16349. This sample claimed to be pure olive oil, but contains some cotton-seed oil.

Bottle—Olive oil. Sample of imported olive oil adulterated with cotton-seed oil. The size of the bottle is also misrepresented, as it contains only one-half the amount stated on the label. This form of adulteration was very common before the food-inspection law went into effect, but now samples are very seldom obtained containing cotton-seed oil.

Bottle—Sample of imported egg albumen preserved with 1 per cent of boric acid. Out of 121 samples of egg products examined since July 1, 1905, 13 were adulterated.

Bottle—Apple-cider extract. Artificial extract prepared from ethers and alcohol.

Bottle—Grape-cider extract. Artificial extract prepared from ethers and alcohol, flavored with orange-flower water.

Bottle—Extract of lemon. Sample of lemon extract. This sample contains no lemon oil, but is purely an artificial product. Report of Michigan dairy and food commission, 1904, shows that of 159 samples examined 56 were adulterated. Report of New Hampshire State board of health, 1904, shows that of 53 samples examined 34 were adulterated. Report of North Dakota Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 10 samples examined 7 were adulterated.

Bottle—Vanilla. Sample of vanilla extract. This sample is a purely artificial product prepared from vanillin. This is a very common form of adulteration. Report of New Hampshire State board of health, 1904, shows that of 32 samples examined 22 were adulterated. Report of Massachusetts State board of health, 1903, shows that of 25 samples examined 12 were adulterated.

Bottle—Maraschino cherries. Samples of imported cherries colored with coal-tar dye. Practically all samples of imported cherries were found to be colored, but are now being properly labeled. Out of 54 samples examined since July 1, 1905, only 4 were not properly labeled. All of the rest were labeled "Artificially colored."

Bottle—Sample of crême de menthe cherries colored with coal-tar dye.

Can—Frankfurters. Sample of imported German sausage, containing boric acid. This form of adulteration was very common before the import pure-food law went into effect, but at present practically none of the sausages are found to be preserved. Out of 181 samples examined from 1903–4, 31 samples were found to be preserved.

Can—German sausage. Sample of imported German sausage, preserved with large amount of benzoic acid. This form of adulteration was very common before the import pure-food law went into effect, but at present practically none of the sausages are found to be preserved. Out of 181 samples examined from 1903–4, 31 samples were found to be adulterated.

Can—Sausage. Sample of imported sausage, preserved with aluminum acetate. This form of adulteration was very common before the import pure-food law went into effect, but at present practically none of the sausages are found to be preserved. Out of 181 samples examined from 1903–4, 31 samples were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Sample of whole pepper very largely adulterated with pepper hulls. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1901, shows that of 51 samples examined 20 were adulterated. Report Massachusetts State board of health, 1904, shows that of 62 samples examined 24 were adulterated.

Bottle—Black pepper adulterated with 15 per cent tapioca covered with lamp black.

Glass—Pineapple jelly. Sample of so-called "Pineapple jelly" made up largely of glucose and preserved with benzoic acid. Upon a very careful examination of the label, it was found to be marked "compound." Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1898, shows that of 64 samples examined 42 were adulterated. Report Minnesota dairy and food commission, 1900, shows that of 32 samples examined 18 were adulterated. Report North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 33 samples examined 33 were adulterated. Report Michigan dairy and food commission, 1904, shows that of 97 samples examined 71 were found to be adulterated.

Glass—Quince jelly. Sample of so-called "Quince jelly," made up largely of glucose and preserved with benzoic acid. Upon a very careful examination of the label, it was found to be marked "compound." Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1898, shows that of 64 samples examined 42 were adulterated. Report Minnesota dairy and food commission, 1900, shows that of 32 samples examined 18 were adulterated. Report North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 33 samples examined 33 were adulterated. Report Michigan dairy and food commission, 1904, shows that of 97 samples examined 71 were found to be adulterated.

Jar—Plum preserves. Sample of plum preserves very largely adulterated with glucose, colored with a coal-tar dye. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1898, shows that of 64 samples examined, 42 were adulterated. Report Minnesota Dairy and Food Commission, 1900, shows that of 32 samples examined, 18 were adulterated. Report North Dakota Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 33 samples of preserves, jellies, etc., examined, 33 were adulterated. Report Michigan Dairy and Food Commission, 1904, shows that of 97 samples examined, 71 were adulterated.

Jar—Honey. Sample of honey, which is found marked "compound" in very small letters on the label. This sample is largely glucose and bugs. Report Massachusetts State Board of Health, 1903, shows that of 59 samples examined, 24 were found to be adulterated. Report Minnesota Dairy and Food Commission, 1903, shows that of 114 samples examined, 16 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Maple sirup. Sample of maple sirup adulterated with a large percentage of cane sirup. The addition of cane sirup to maple sirup is an almost universal practice. Report Massachusetts State Board of Health, 1903, shows that out of 57 samples examined, 14 were found to be adulterated. Report Ohio Dairy and Food Commission, 1903, shows that of 129 samples examined, 102 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Libby's tomato catsup. Sample of catsup which is preserved with a large amount of benzoic acid.

Bottle—Sunbeam catsup. Sample of catsup preserved with benzoic acid. Practically all catsups are preserved with benzoate of soda. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1904, shows that out of 66 samples of catsup examined 66 were found to be adulterated. Bulletin North Carolina State Board of Agriculture, 1903, shows that of 22 samples examined 22 were found to be adulterated. Report Ohio Dairy and Food Commission, 1903, shows that of 9 samples examined 9 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Navelade. Sample of fruit sirup colored with a coal-tar dye and preserved with salicylic acid. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, part 3, 1902, shows that of 27 samples examined 20 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Imported vinegar. This vinegar, claimed to be made from pure wine, is a diluted vinegar colored with caramel. This form of adulteration is very common. Out of 136 samples of vinegar examined since July 1, 1905, 64 were found to be adulterated.

Can—Peas. Sample of peas. This sample is preserved by taking dried peas and soaking them, and is a very low grade of what is known as "soaked goods." We have no data as to the extent of this class of adulteration.

Can—Corn. Sample of sweet corn labeled "of the best quality," which has been soaked and is commonly known as "soaked goods." We have no data as to the extent of this form of adulteration.

Can—Mustard. Sample of mustard colored with turmeric and mixed with flour. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1904, shows that of 14 samples of ground mustard examined 10 were found to be adulterated. Report Massachusetts State board of health, 1903, shows that of 250 samples examined 66 were found adulterated. Report Michigan dairy and food commission, 1904, shows that of 4 samples examined 4 were found to be adulterated.

Can—Cocoa. Cocoa containing a large amount of arrowroot starch. Arrowroot costs $0.12 to $0.15 per pound. Cocoa costs $0.40 to $0.80 a pound. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 45 samples of cocoa 19 were found to be adulterated. Report Massachusetts State board of health, 1903, shows that of 42 samples examined 20 were found to be adulterated. Report Michigan dairy and food commission, 1904, shows that of 39 samples examined 18 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Sample of carbonated soda water. This sample is artificially colored with coal-tar dye and sweetened with saccharin. The sample of cloth accompanying this bottle was dyed with the coloring matter from a bottle of this size. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 71 samples of soda water examined 43 were found to be adulterated. Report State board of health, 1904, shows that of 36 samples examined 25 were found to be adulterated. Bulletin North Carolina State board of agriculture, 1903, shows that of 36 samples examined 24 were found to be adulterated.

Bottle—Scotch hop ale. Sample of carbonated beverage of soda-water type, preserved with benzoate of soda. Report Connecticut Agricultural Experiment Station, 1902, shows that of 71 samples of soda water examined 43 were adulterated. Report New Hampshire State Board of Health, 1904, shows that of 36 samples examined 23 were adulterated. Bulletin North Carolina State Board of Agriculture, 1903, shows that of 36 samples examined 24 were adulterated.

Bottle—Barsac. Sample of imported wine which contains a very large amount of sulphurous acid. A report for food inspection from 1903 to 1905 for the Bureau of Chemistry, shows that out of 1,097 samples of wine examined 189 were contrary to the law.

Bottle—Rhine wine. Sample of imported Rhine wine, preserved with salicylic acid. This is not a very common form of adulteration.

Bottle—Lime-juice cordial. Sample of lime-juice cordial. This sample is preserved with a large amount of salicylic acid.

MEMORANDUM OF "HABIT-FORMING DRUGS."

The following "habit-forming drugs" have, within the last year or two, been stated upon good authority to be contained in the following medicines. These statements have been found in various medical journals and board of health reports and Collier's Weekly. The latter has collected from various sources extensive data on this subject. In view of the fact that recently heavy damages (reported as about $17,000) were obtained from a popular magazine because of an untrue statement that a certain "patent medicine" contained alcohol and opium, these data have, doubtless, been carefully confirmed. In the case of a few of the preparations named below, the label states that cocaine, etc., are contained; a few others are ostensibly sold only on physicians' prescriptions, but most of them are entirely secret and in many cases stated to be harmless.

The patent medicines containing a large percentage of alcohol are not given here, for, as a result of recent rulings of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, there have been extensive changes in the composition of this class of medicines. There is no doubt, however, that there are still upon the market a number of medicines containing a considerable percentage of alcohol in combination with drugs for which there is little recognized use.

Cannabis indica.—Piso's Consumption Cure.

NOTES ON SOME PREPARATIONS CONTAINING HABIT-FORMING DRUGS.

Chloral hydrate.—"Bromidia:" This is one of the best-known proprietary remedies containing chloral hydrate. It is not necessary to make any comments concerning this product, because the formula is printed on each package. It complies, therefore, fully with the bill at present before Congress.

Cocaine.—"Doctor Birney's Catarrh Powder" and "Doctor Agnew's Catarrh Powder:" Both of these remedies contain cocaine. This information is contained on both packages. The sticker on "Doctor Birney's Catarrh Powder" simply states "Contains a small quantity of cocaine," while the amount of cocaine present in "Doctor Agnew's Catarrh Powder" is clearly set forth on the label and amounts to 2¼ per cent of cocaine hydrochlorate.

Heroin.—"Ayer's Cherry Pectoral" and "Glyco-Heroin" (Smith): Both of these preparations are also marked as to the presence of their active medicinal constituents. "Ayer's Cherry Pectoral" gives all the ingredients said to be present in this compound. "Glyco-Heroin" does not go as far as that, but clearly sets forth that it contains heroin. Heroin is frequently considered as not being as dangerous a drug as morphine or opium, but during the past few years the medical profession has had numerous examples to indicate that heroin is nearly as dangerous in the formation of habits as is morphine.

Morphine and opium.—"Godfrey's Cordial," "Chamberlain's Diarrhea Remedy," "Kopp's Baby's Friend," "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup," and "Salvita:" These preparations serve to bring out interesting points. "Godfrey's Cordial" is a well-known remedy, which anyone is at liberty to prepare. Its composition is well known to all druggists and manufacturing pharmacists. The value of the remedy depends largely on the morphine which it contains. "Kopp's Baby Friend" is known to contain morphine and has been instrumental in causing the death of a number of children during the past few years. Nothing is said relative to the presence of the dangerous poison, morphine. "Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup" is known to contain opium or opium in some form. Such information, however, is not given on the package or the literature accompanying same. In England the manufacturer of this preparation is compelled to clearly indicate that it is a poison, according to the laws of that country. "Chamberlain's Diarrhea Remedy" clearly sets forth in literature accompanying the sample the presence of opium, in the following language: "N. B. With the exception of chronic diarrhea, this remedy is not recommended for any disease that would require its habitual use. It should not be used habitually, as it contains about half a grain of opium in each teaspoonful." Reference is also made on the label of the bottle to the directions in wrapper around each bottle. This would probably be sufficient information, but it seems that if it is desirable to call attention to the presence of opium in the advertising literature, such information should also be clearly indicated on the label of the bottle itself. "Salvita" is one of the remedies which is represented in the advertising literature as being free from opium or any of its salts. An examination, however, showed that this representation is false, opium being present.

Acetanilid.—Acetanilid is a most beneficial and useful medicinal remedy, but during the past few years it has been placed in the hands of the laity in so many forms under the guise of headache cures, neuralgia cures, etc., that at present there are many women who are unable to do their daily work without taking a portion of some compound containing acetanilid, in order to properly do their daily tasks. A brief perusal of the proprietary remedies handled in a wholesale way throughout this country shows that there are over 300 preparations used for this purpose, and it would probably not be far from the truth to say that all of them contain acetanilid. The following are among the most widely used and well-known headache remedies: "Antikamnia," "Bromo Seltzer," "Harper's Brain Food," and "Red Dragon Seltzer."

"Antikamnia" is largely advertised, and there are very few households in the United States that do not know this remedy, and in many cases there are persons who take some of this remedy daily. The chief constituent is acetanilid.

"Bromo Seltzer" and "Red Dragon Seltzer" both contain acetanilid as the chief ingredient.

"Harper's Brain Food" is a liquid preparation containing acetanilid. The following statements on the package of this remedy are unwarranted: "A positive cure for headache, neuralgia, nervousness, insomnia, etc." "This preparation is perfectly harmless, and may be relied upon as containing nothing injurious." This remedy will not cure any of the affections enumerated, but simply relieves.

Alpha and Beta Eucaine.—No preparation containing either or both of the above compounds is known to the drug laboratory. They are, however, used in place of and substitutes for cocaine, and in some States where it is unlawful to sell cocaine eucaine is frequently supplied to cocaine habitués.

Medicine without alcohol.—A large proportion of the liquid medicinal preparations contain more or less of alcohol as a solvent, and it is a common belief that medicinal remedies can not be prepared without this agent. This position is not correct. There are a goodly number of preparations which do not contain any alcohol; as a notable example of the proprietary remedies may be cited "Pierce's Favorite Prescription." This compound does not contain any alcohol, its solvent constituents being water and glycerine.

"Grandma's Secret" is another child soother. It killed the young son of Mr. and Mrs. Nankivell, of Shampkin, Pa., in December last.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter yesterday. You want to know whether it is true that our son died from the effects of a medicine called "Grandma's Secret." That is the truth. That was the cause of his death.

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

Another of this class is "Nurses and Mothers' Treasure," which Joseph and Nellie Kucer, of Fall River, Mass., gave to their 3-weeks-old child to make it sleep. He did not awake. Opium poisoning was the verdict of the medical examiner. Neither "Grandma's Secret" nor "Nurses and Mothers' Treasure" has any label showing that they contain a dangerous poison. On the contrary, "Nurses and Mothers' Treasure," in its advertising, warns the public against the use of other soothing sirups and nostrums which, it says, contain laudanum or opium.

APRIL 21, 1906.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 10th, which was for some reason delayed in transit, would say that R. H. Shofner died in Sidney, N. Y., on April 6 from an overdose of morphia taken in Fenner's Cough Honey, a medicine put out by the Fenner Medicine Company, of Fredonia, N. Y.

He took during the day and evening, the greater portions during the evening, about 7 ounces of the medicine, which contains one-sixteenth grain of morphia to the dram.

Practically all the circumstances were given in the newspapers. Autopsy revealed no evidences of other disease.

Yours, truly,

S. J. WHITE, Jr.,
Coroner of Delaware County, N. Y.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, BUREAU OF CHEMISTRY,
Washington, D. C., May 1, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of April 30, I beg to advise you that local druggists inform us that they do not keep Fenner's Cough Honey, neither do they know anything about this preparation. We shall, however, take steps to secure this product for you, and make the requested analysis as soon as possible. The Fenner Medicine Company, I am informed, disposes of its wares largely through itinerant drug venders.

In your letter you also ask whether one-half grain of morphine to the ounce, which is twice the quantity proposed by the Lovering amendment, had any material weight in connection with the Shofner case. If the "cough honey" contained only one-sixteenth of a grain of morphine to the dram, 7 ounces of the material, the amount consumed by R. H. Shofner, would contain 1¾ grains of morphine, which is sufficient to kill an adult in normal health, provided similar conditions prevailed as those under which Shofner lost his life. One and three-fourths grains of morphine taken over the period of time in which the Fenner's Cough Honey was taken might not prove fatal if suitable precautions were taken to counteract the effects of the drug.

The point in the case is simply this: That even if small quantities of morphine are present in a proprietary remedy which goes into the hands of the laity disastrous results are liable to follow.

Very respectfully,

H. W. WILEY, Chief.

Doctor Fenner's Cough Syrup. Volume, 10 ounces. Price, $1. This is a saccharine mixture containing expectorants, such as tolu, but the active valuable constituent in this remedy undoubtedly is morphine, which is present to the extent of one-fourth grain to 1 ounce.

OFFICE OF ROBERT DODD, CORONER OF ONEIDA COUNTY,
Utica, N. Y., June 13, 1906.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed herewith find copy of decision in the matter of the death of the Zarlak twins.

Pardon me for again suggesting that you obtain a copy of the reports of Doctors Nelson and Smith, chemists, and which are on file in the county clerk's office of the county of Oneida, N. Y., at Utica, N. Y.

ROBT. DODD, Coroner.

STATE OF NEW YORK,
County of Oneida, city of Utica, ss:

Decision made and rendered at the inquest of Adam and Eve Gnad, or Zarlak, in the city of Utica, county of Oneida, N. Y., on the 25th and 26th days of January and 15th and 21st days of February, 1906, by Robert Dodd, one of the coroners of said county, after inspecting the body of Adam and Eve Gnad, or Zarlak, then and there lying dead, at No. 25 Kossuth avenue, setting forth who the said persons were, and when, where, and by what means they came to his and her death, and the circumstances attending such death of said Adam and Eve Gnad, or Zarlak.

Now, after inspecting the said bodies and hearing the testimony, the said coroner doth render his decision and hereby certify it in writing accordingly, as follows:

That the said Adam and Eve Gnad, otherwise known as Zarlak, died on the 25th day of January, 1906. The boy died at about 2.30 p. m., and the girl died at 7.45 p. m., at No. 25 Kossuth avenue, in the city of Utica, county of Oneida, N. Y., of morphine poisoning. The evidence shows that Stanislaus Gnad, the father of the infants, had administered to them a dose of a mixture which is known as "Kopp's Baby's Friend" on the night of January 24, 1906, and that the infants (whose age was 1 month and 1 day) died on the following day. Now, after investigating the circumstances attending such deaths and obtaining the report of Doctors James G. Hunt and H. F. Preston, who made an autopsy on the bodies of the deceased infants, and also the report of Doctors Nelson and Smith, chemists, who made an examination of the stomachs and the stomachs' contents and also a portion of the mixture above mentioned, showing that it contained morphine, I find and decide that the said Adam and Eve Gnad, otherwise called Zarlak, died from an overdose of "Kopp's Baby's Friend," which was administered by their father, but without criminal intent.

The testimony of the witnesses examined before said coroner is hereto attached.

In witness whereof the said coroner aforesaid hath to this decision set his hand this 23d day of February, 1906.

BALTIMORE MD., June 11, 1906.

DEAR SIR: Your letter addressed to the coroner of Baltimore has come to my notice. I held an inquest on the body of George Lancaster who took "Kopp's Baby's Friend."

Very truly, yours, C. FRANK JONES, M. D.

MEDICINE ACTS LIKE HASHEESH—CHILD BECOMES VIOLENT ON TAKING PATENT COMPOUND—DOCTOR HASTILY SUMMONED—EFFECT OF TWO SMALL DOSES ON LITTLE FANNY DUTCHER LIKE THAT OF DRUG OF EAST INDIA.

A doctor's services were required at the residence of Mrs. Lottie Dutcher, of No. 1025 Avery avenue, Saturday evening after her 2-year-old daughter Fanny had been given two doses of a patent medicine, the total quantity not being a teaspoonful.

The child's condition thereafter so alarmed the mother that Dr. H. C. Gifford, of Solvay, was called, and he said the case had the appearance of drugging by the East Indian hasheesh, or cannabis indica.

The little girl was not feeling well in the afternoon, and at 5 o'clock Mrs. Dutcher gave here a small quantity of the medicine. Before putting her to bed at 8 o'clock she gave a second dose, after which the child began to act in a peculiar manner and to scream so loudly as to attract the attention of neighbors.

Her mother endeavored to carry her in her arms. At times her movements were so frantic that the mother was compelled to lay her on the floor.

COUNTERACTING MEDICINE GIVEN.

At 11 o'clock, fearing convulsions, she called Doctor Gifford, and counteracting medicine was administered. Shortly after midnight the girl dropped into a troubled sleep, waking yesterday morning relieved.

Doctor Gifford said yesterday that while he did not know the ingredients of the compound, he judged from its taste and the effect that it contained Cannabis indica. This, he said, was the "booze" of the Hindoos.

Mrs. Dutcher says that she has used the compound to some extent in her family for adults, but never gave it to a child before. (Syracuse Post-Standard, April 9, 1906.)

CHILLICOTHE, OHIO, January 17.

The coroner of this county declares that the death of Matthew Washington, 28, a negro, was directly caused by Hardman's Magic Cure, made by the Magic Cure Company, of Springfield.

The negro had a severe cold and took two doses of the medicine, according to the statements made here by the coroner. In twenty minutes he was dead. An agent had sold him the medicine.

DOCTOR BULL'S COUGH SIRUP NEARLY KILLED BABY—INFANT DRANK CONTENTS OF BOTTLE WHILE MOTHER WAS NOT LOOKING AND FELL INTO STUPOR.

Opium in a patent cough sirup nearly caused the death of a 2-year-old boy who got hold of a bottle of cough sirup last night and, after satisfying his taste for the sweet medicine, fell into a stupor from which he was aroused only after the most vigorous efforts of the surgeons at St. Mary's Hospital.

The child's parents, named Toal, reside at 278 Smith street. The babe had been ailing fr some time. While its mother was not watching it got hold of the bottle and drank most of its contents. Opium formed one of the ingredients. The drug soon took effect, and the child escaped death by a narrow margin. (Rochester (N. Y.) Paper, March —, 1906.)

EVELETH, MINN., April 18, 1906.

Death followed the accidental taking of an overdose of "White Pine Cough Sirup," by James William, the 3-year-old son of Mr. and Mrs. James W. Falk, of Eveleth, yesterday.

DULUTH, MINN., April 20, 1906.

SAMUEL H. ADAMS, Esq.,
Care of Collier's, 416 West Thirteenth Street,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: I herewith inclose you extract from a local paper, the Duluth News-Tribune, under date of April 19, which may prove of interest to you. I have followed your articles in Collier's attacking certain patent medicines with a great deal of interest and admiration, and on coming across this I though perhaps it might be of assistance as well as interest to you.

I think the occurrence very sad indeed, and I have no doubt that if the "White Pine Medicine" people had properly labeled the bottle as containing poison of some sort the parents would have been careful to place this bottle beyond the infant's reach. As it is, a mother and father are quite heartbroken, just because some company wishes to make a few paltry dollars more quickly.

Once more assuring you of my deep interest and admiration for your work, I remain,

Very respectfully, yours, LOUIS ZALK.

EL PASO, TEX., April 19, 1906.

DEAR SIR: I have recently treated a plumber in this city who has used a 50-cent bottle of Chamberlain's Diarrhea Remedy every day for years for the opium it contained.

About two years ago I saw an infant die with what I thought to be opium poisoning, following a few doses of German Syrup (Boschee's ?).

Yours, very truly,

F. P. MILLER.

[Letter to a physician.]

CHICAGO, April 3, 1906.

Having by accident heard of your sanitarium for the opiate cure, I have at last decided to write you of my own case. I have tried so many cures and been to different sanitariums and have not found one yet that makes a permanent cure. I have suffered from the curse all that any human could suffer, and have spent a fortune and still I am not free. Through a friend I was induced to try the St. James Society remedy, of Broadway, New York, who claims to cure the most obstinate cases. I have been taking the remedy now for three years; I am not cured, neither can I give up the remedy. I am convinced there is morphia or some kind of an opiate in it; what amount, of course, I do not know. I asked them some time since, but, of course, they refused to tell me, but said this much: That if I was obliged to use the morphia with the remedy that 4 to 5 grains ought to keep me comfortable for twenty-four hours. I prefer their remedy rather than the morphia. I certainly am very miserable to use the morphia; in fact, I can not use it. I have tried to cut off from the remedy to the elixir, which they claim is the final; but it would not support me. On the whole, it is as hard for me to try to give up the remedy as the opiate.

Mrs. MILLER.

SOOTHING SIRUP—BABY DEAD.

MONTREAL, May 22.

A 6-months-old girl, Violet Jarvis, whose parents arrived from England a week ago and are staying at Lachine, died, and it was established at the inquest this morning that she had died from the effects of soothing sirup administered after she had arrived in Montreal and was too weak to withstand its effects.

The jury brought in a verdict declaring no crime, but adding that 'the label on such patent-medicine bottles should bear the names of the ingredients composing the medicine."

657 BOYLSTON STREET,
Boston, Mass., January 12, 1906.

Mr. SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS.

DEAR SIR: I have followed with great interest your splendid articles in Collier's, and feel that you are surely doing an immense amount of good by them.

May I call your attention to an article called "Celerina," made by the Rio Chemical Company, New York? It is supposed to be a useful and harmless remedy, "especially suitable for clergymen, school-teachers," etc., and is, I believe, used by teachers to a considerable degree.

At least one teacher's life has been almost wrecked by its use in a time of great mental and physical strain. Of course she took it in increasing quantities until completely prostrated by its effect, and now, nine months later, her mind is only just recovering its former tone.

Hoping that you may find an opportunity to examine this preparation, I am, yours, sincerely,

ANNIE LEE HAMILTON, M. D.

HAMILTON, OHIO, October —, 1905.

At 12 o'clock that night he (the doctor) was called and told the baby could not be aroused, that it had been sleeping for an hour or more and had almost stopped breathing. A neighbor had suggested giving the child a dose of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Sirup, and it had been given two doses of one-half teaspoonful, each one-half hour apart. On examination, Doctor Cummins found the pupils contracted to the size of a pin head, pulse very slow, and respiration four a minute. He diagnosed opium poisoning. Doctor Cook was called in consultation, and after four hours' work they succeeded in bringing the patient around all right. Doctor Cummins states that he has no doubt that this was a case of opium poisoning from the morphine contained in the soothing sirup.

SHELBURNE FALLS, MASS., March 24, 1906.

I wish to add a few words about Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera, and Diarrhœa Remedy. Two weeks ago I was consulted by a railroad telegrapher who had been taking this medicine for the past two years. He began it for a diarrhea and has become addicted to it. He now takes from 2 to 4 ounces nightly (he is a night man), and has become a complete nervous wreck.

Judge Smith sentenced Miss Ella Clark, of this city (Mason City), to Mount Pleasant Asylum to-day (January 29, 1906). She was proven to be addicted to the use of morphine to the extent that her health had been undermined, and she is now almost a physical wreck and is confined to her bed. In her desire for the drug she bought large quantities of Chamberlain's Colic Remedy, which, it is said, she has been using for years.

OPIUM HABIT IN INFANT FROM KOPP'S BABY'S FRIEND.

We have to record another case of poisoning from the use of Kopp's Baby's Friend. How many such cases occur annually it is, of course, impossible to state, but undoubtedly there are many children who are ruined for life, morally and physically, by the continued use of "patent medicines" containing opiates.

This patient is the infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edwin Jordan, 1204 West Monroe street, Chicago. Ten months ago, when the child's mother was visiting her old home in Rebersburg, Pa., the child suffered from colic, and the mother was advised by her former pastor, the Reverend Mr. Bixler, a Lutheran minister of that place, to try Kopp's Baby's Friend, which, he stated, was perfectly harmless and had been used in his family. Dr. J. J. Deshler, Glidden, Iowa, a relative of the family, recently visited Mr. and Mrs. Jordan and at once noticed that the child was in an abnormal condition. He reports the case as follows:

"The medicine was used continuously, according to the instructions on the label, since the child was about 4 months old, once or twice daily, the last dosage being 1 teaspoonful. The child was under the influence of the opiate the whole twenty-four hours. Dentition is almost completely absent, and a general condition of lassitude and listlessness is present.

"Appetite has been fair so that the child is in a well-nourished condition. Its age now is 14 months. The child has an extremely waxy pallor and appears sleepy. While taking the preparation the child 'did not seem to be able to open its eyes wide' (see illustration). It can now do this. It was formerly constipated, then lately a severe diarrhea set in, but that ceased when the drug was discontinued.

"I prescribed 2 minims each of tincture of asafetida and tincture of hyoscyamus in a little sweetened water.

"When necessary an occasional dose of a carminative tablet containing a minute dose of codein sulphate was given. The parents were instructed to give plenty of nourishment, and pasteurized milk was prescribed.

"Since the child has been taking this the mother states that it is much better and brighter, and takes more interest in its surroundings, though, naturally, it is cross and irritable."

We sent a physician to see the child and to learn present conditions. They are as reported by Doctor Deshler. Mrs. Jordan expressed her willingness to have the report published, in the hope that it may be the means of saving other babies from a similar fate. She declared that had she known the preparation contained morphine she would never have used it; and she was very emphatic in stating that "the Government should prohibit the sale of such dangerous preparations." (Journal of the American Medical Association, May 19, 1906.)

WHITESVILLE, N. Y., April 16, 1906.

DEAR SIR: In regard to yours of April 1, regarding the death of John Grumley, deceased was an oil-well pumper; went out on the lease to pump the wells about 2 p. m. March 15; was found in power house by his brother the next morning, March 16, at 8.30 a. m. He was in a comatose condition; saw him about 11.30; respiration and pulse slow and irregular; very slight response to stimulation. An empty bromo-seltzer bottle was found by his side in power house; had been in the habit of taking it, and had complained to his brother of prostration on numerous occasions after taking. No marks of violence were found on body, and as no symptoms of apoplexy or thrombus were present, Doctor Vaughn and myself were of the opinion that his death was from the cause stated. No autopsy was held. Barneys Mill is a railroad station on the New York and Pennsylvania, in Steuben County, N. Y.; post-office at Rexville, 2½ miles distant.

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

OFFICE OF COUNTY CORONER, HAMILTON COUNTY, OHIO,
Cincinnati, November 17, 1905.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed please find verdict in the Hilda Keck case, which was given out to-day.

Respectfully, yours, OTIS L. CAMERON.

The testimony shows that the child's mother had given her a dose of the above-named cough sirup, and, thinking it harmless, had placed the bottle on a chair beside the bed. The child, while the mother slept, drank the contents of the bottle with fatal results.

An analysis shows that a bottle of this cough sirup contains 0.48 of a grain of morphia sulphate, or about ⅓ of a grain to the teasponful.

It is reasonable to assume that so potent a drug as morphia can not be used as freely as these sirups are without danger, as the following extract from Stille's Therapeutics and Materia Medica on opium shows:

"Like other medicines, opium acts with peculiar force on very young persons. * * * The uncertainty of its action upon the young has long been known, and has led to the reiteration by medical writers of cautions in regard to its administration."

STATE OF INDIANA,
Madison County, ss:

I, Charles Trueblood, coroner of said county, having examined the body of William H. Hawkins, and heard the testimony of the witnesses, which said testimony is hereto attached, do hereby find that the said deceased came to his death the 9th day of October, 1905, from paralysis of circulation, caused by taking Doctor Davis's Headache Powders. Said William H. Hawkins, a resident of Indianapolis, Ind., had come to Madison County, via Indiana Union Traction Company, on legal business, had transacted said business and reentered a car of Indiana Union Traction Company for Marion, Ind., where he expired while seated in said car.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and the seal of my office this 12th day of October, 1905.

CHARLES TRUEBLOOD,
Coroner of Madison County.

POWDERS NEARLY FATAL—MRS. L. W. STONE, OF 96 TAYLOR AVENUE, UNCONSCIOUS NEARLY THREE HOURS.

After taking three powders of a package that had been procured for her at a corner grocery, Mrs. L. W. Stone, of 96 Taylor avenue, Saturday, became unconscious and was so thoroughly overcome that her life was at times despaired of. Nearly three hours of work were necessary to bring her out from under the influences of the powerful drug contained in the powder. Yesterday she was much improved, and it is stated that she will recover.

Mrs. Stone had suffered from a severe headache when she arose Saturday morning, and about 9 o'clock she sent to the grocery for a package of headache cure. She took one of the powders; about 10 o'clock she took another, and at 11.30 she took a third. At 1 o'clock members of the family summoned Dr. A. L. Holden, who found Mrs. Stone in an unconscious condition. Her entire body had a purple color, her pulse was so low as to be scarcely distinguishable, her hands and lips were black. Powerful stimulants were administered, and after two hours and a half of diligent work she began to show signs of improvement. During the three hours she was under the influence of the drug she underwent convulsions, and her condition was considered precarious.

The headache powder was "The Forestine Headache Powder," manufactured by T. J. Beebe & Sons, of Albany. The carton states that the powders "contain no opiate and are warranted to cure" a large number of ills, headache included. It is advertised as four cures for 10 cents. Examination of the powders by Doctor Holden showed that it contained acetanelid, one of the deadly poisons, and said to be an ingredient of nearly every headache powder manufactured. The directions on the package say:

"Throw a powder on the tongue and take a swallow of water, if necessary. Repeat in fifteen minutes. Sickness or sourness of stomach relieved in five minutes. Eat and drink sparingly. The grip disappears when one of these is taken. One every four hours." (Utica (N. Y.) Daily Press, May 14, 1906.)

CARTHAGE MO., April 27, 1906.

Mr. SAMUEL H. ADAMS,
Collier's Weekly, New York City.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of April 24, 1906, making inquiry as to the cause of death of Matt Cherry upon April 17, 1906, will say that the preparation which he was taking was Miles' Pain Pills. I have been the family physician of this family for a long time, but never had been called upon to prescribe for him. He was a very robust individual, and operated a channeller at a stone quarry. His wife says that he was subject to headache and had been taking a good many of these pills during the past winter. His assistant states that he saw him take some tablets shortly before he complained of being sick. He was dead when I reached him.

Yours, sincerely, C. M. KETCHAM.

MAY 9, 1906.

Mr. S. H. ADAMS,
416 West Thirteenth Street, New York.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your query concerning the name of the tablet that caused the death of Matt Cherry, it was Dr. Miles Anti-Pain Tablet.

Yours, DR. K. E. BAKER.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., November 27, 1905.

DEAR SIR: It is with great thankfulness that I at last see a ray of enlightenment going to the public about patents. As a druggist in a humble way, I have been trying to educate people in my immediate neighborhood on the proper way of medication via the physician.

I think acetanilid in its various forms more dangerous even than opium, inasmuch as the people have an inkling of the fact that cough sirups, soothing sirups, and patents in that category contain a certain amount of opium or morphine, but with headache and antineuralgic preparations no such knowledge is as yet extant.

I would call your attention to the fact that Mr. A. Heiman, an immediate neighbor of mine at that time, very nearly died of a dose of two antikamnia tablets taken fifteen or twenty minutes apart, containing 10 grams in all of this compound. If immediate medical help was not available no doubt the makers of this preparation would have been guilty of another murder. I do not see for the life of me why a law could not be passed prohibiting both the manufacture and sale of such nostrums.

Yours, truly. GEO. A. THOMAS.

GIRL LYING IN SNOWDRIFT—OVERCOME BY HEADACHE REMEDY ON HER WAY TO WORK, SHE WANDERED ALL DAY—BROMO SELTZER.

Charlotte Thompson, 17 years old, of 162 West 116th street, was found lying in a snowdrift about 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon at 188th street and Amsterdam avenue by Policeman Thomas Barry of the West 152d street station, half frozen. She was taken to the Washington Heights Hospital. When stimulants had been given to her, she said that she had been walking the streets since morning, but she could not tell where she had been.

The young woman is a bookkeeper in a furnishing goods store on West 125th street. Going to work, she stopped in a drug store to get a remedy for a headache. After that she says she has no recollection of what happened.

Barry almost stumbled over the girl's body in a pile of snow. At first he thought she was dead.

The young woman was found nearly 5 miles away from her home. The physicians at the hospital said that the girl might have suffered from something in the drug she took. She will be able to go home to-day. (New York paper, April, 1906.)

DALLASTOWN, PA., March 19, 1906.

COLLIER'S WEEKLY, New York.

MY DEAR SIR: Being interested in your well-directed efforts to stop the slaughter of the innocents by proprietary poisons, I report to you the following:

On February 18, 1906, at Craley, Pa., Ralph E. Kinard, a child of 2 years, died from effects of "Kopp's Baby's Friend." Dr. N. A. Overmiller, of East Prospect, Pa., the attending physician, reported cause of death opium poison.

MR. SAMUEL H. ADAMS, care Collier's.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to thank you for having intervened in a well-meant attempt on my part to poison myself. I had already half accomplished the feat when I read in Collier's that Bromo-Quinine contains acetanilide. I had been taking the tablets for a severe cold in the head and should probably have persisted in taking them, as the symptoms, especially the headache, grew worse, and the directions on the box favor persistent treatment until recovery.

Personally, I consider this fraud to be the worse that you have exposed, because the so-called "medicine" is virtually masquerading under the guise of other medicines which are well known and definite in their effects. I would not have taken acetanilide, knowing it to be such, on any account. The quantity, I suppose, I swallowed under the guise of bromine and quinine has made me miserably ill for the last ten days.

CINCINNATI HOSPITAL, Cincinnati, May 1½, 1906.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 12th to hand. In reply, will state as follows:

On the morning of May 5 a colored man brought in a child about 2 years old and said that it had swallowed the contents of a 2-ounce bottle of Piso's Cough Sirup.

He produced the bottle and it then contained about one teaspoonful, so that if the youngster started with a full bottle (and the father said he had), he must have taken a pretty good dose.

The child was pretty well stupified, but his pupils were not markedly contracted; but I at once had his stomach carefully washed out and in about an hour he was taken home out of all danger.

I spoke to one druggist here, and he said there was no way of telling exactly the contents of the bottle, unless we analyzed; but on looking up some works, we found it stated that each fluid drachm contained one-fourth grain morphine sulphate and cannabis indica in variable amounts.

If that is true the child got enough morphia to kill him very easily or promptly, unless medical aid was at hand.

Personally, I am inclined to doubt there being such an amount of morphia present, because of the absence of the "pin-point pupil;" yet, as cannabis indica generally dilates the pupil, it is possible it may have masked that symptom of morphine poisoning.

The name of the patent medicine taken by my little boy was Piso's Cough Cure.

CHICAGO, December 8, 1905.

DEAR SIR: I have just read your articles on cold cures, headache powders, and the like.

I take the liberty of writing this letter to thank you and Collier's Weekly. These things are a menace to the public and should be driven from the market.

As you are doubtless aware, owing probably to "the lake," catarrh is quite common in Chicago. Some years since some "damned good-natured friend" told me to try Doctor Birney's Catarrh Cure. I did. There was nothing to indicate the presence of cocaine or any other noxious ingredient. I took several bottles, and they, like the immortal Oliver Twist, called for more.

One day I asked an honest druggist for it and he said, "In the name of God, man, do you know what you are taking? That stuff will give you the cocaine habit if you don't cut it out." I "cut it out." And I want to assure you that I had a hell of a time (actually, not figuratively) in doing that same "cutting out."

I truly believe that people are daily using these drugs innocently; they know not what they are.

APRIL 20, 1906.

MR. WILLIAM R. OVERBY,
1½ Kent street, Atlanta, Ga.

DEAR SIR: Will you very kindly let me know the name of the headache powder taken by your daughter, as reported in the newspapers, and also whether it was taken on a physician's prescription?

Thanking you in advance for the information,

I am, SAMUEL H. ADAMS.

SAMUEL H. ADAMS.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your request, I will state it was not a powder I gave my daughter, but a liquid "antimigraine," manufactured by the Antimigraine Company, Savannah, Ga. Our daughter and myself had taken two bottles without any bad effect, and I thought it perfectly safe to give to this one, but it came near proving serious.

Respectfully,

MRS. W. H. OVERBY.

TOO MUCH BROMO SELTZER CAUSED HIS DEATH—FRUIT DEALER DROPS DEAD WHILE TALKING WITH CUSTOMER.

Antonio Tramonte, a fruit dealer, dropped dead in his store at No. 175 Main street at midnight Saturday while talking to two customers. Death was due to an attack of heart disease, Medical Examiner Fuller says, which may have been brought on by the excessive use of bromo seltzer, which Tramonte was in the habit of taking for headaches. Doctor Fuller said that analysis has proved that a teaspoonful of bromo seltzer contains 7½ grains of acetanilid, which tends to weaken the heart action. Tramonte took several spoonsful yesterday, and Doctor Fuller said that in all probability Tramonte had a weak heart and the overdose of the drug stopped his heart action.

Tramonte had been a fruit dealer in Hartford for several years. He was 25 years old and leaves a wife. The funeral will be held Tuesday morning from his late residence at 8.30 o'clock, followed by services in St. Anthony's Church. Burial will be in Blue Hills Cemetery. (From the Hartford, Conn., Courant.)

HEADACHE TABLETS KILL HIM—MAJOR SMITH, WELL-KNOWN OSKALOOSA MAN DROPS DEAD AT THE CRICKET MINES.

OSKALOOSA, IOWA, November 21.

Major Smith dropped dead at the Cricket mines to-day from the effects of taking too many headache tablets. (From the Des Moines, Iowa, Register and Leader.)

HEADACHE MEDICINE WAS TOO STRONG.

R. W. Wilkerson, whose home is in Springfield, Tenn., but who is employed as a barber at the Seelbach, was taken to the city hospital about midnight last night. He was ill, it is thought, as the result of some headache medicine he took earlier in the night. His heart is said to be weak, and the powders were too strong, it is thought. He was able to walk to the ambulance from his room in the St. Nicholas Hotel and was never unconscious. Dr. Leo Bloch was called in, but made only a hasty examination and would not say what caused the collapse of the man. He had not been well during the day and complained to the bartender at the hotel before going to his room. He is 24 years old and is unmarried. (From the Louisville, Ky., Journal, January 17, 1906.)

HEADACHE-POWDER VICTIM.

Maud Andrews, a chorus girl, stopping at Beiser's Hotel, opposite the Empire Theater, got some headache powders, with instructions to take one every four hours, last night. Instead of following the directions, the girl took one every half hour, and she finally became unconscious. Doctor Poole, of the dispensary staff, revived her. (From the Indianapolis News, February 15, 1906.)

TOOK A HEADACHE POWDER—DR. H. J. STALKER, OF KENOSHA, WIS., IS PROSTRATED FROM ITS EVIL EFFECTS.

KENOSHA, WIS., February 7.

Dr. H. J. Stalker, of this city, a prominent physician, collapsed at Racine while attending a banquet given by Racine physicians in honor of the Kenosha Medical Association. He was removed to his room in the hotel, and is still in a critical condition. The cause of the sudden collapse is thought to be due to what was supposed to be a harmless headache powder. The members of his family were summoned to the scene. (From the Dubuque, Iowa, Journal, February 8, 1906.)

HEADACHE TABLETS ALMOST PROVE FATAL.

MILLVILLE, N. J., February 14.

Headache tablets proved almost deadly to Mrs. Emma Rubert, wife of Francien Rubert, yesterday afternoon, and when a physician arrived at her home, 229 South Third street, he found her unconscious and apparently lifeless.

Mrs. Rubert felt somewhat ill at dinner time, and, taking headache tablets, tried to take a nap, but when her husband attempted to arouse her a half hour later he was unable to do so.

Mr. Rubert was badly frightened and thought his wife was dead, but called Dr. Charles B. Neal, who applied restoratives, and, after considerable difficulty, succeeded in resuscitating the woman from the comatose state, so that she is now believed to be out of danger.

The tablets had paralyzed the heart and nerve centers, and had Mrs. Rubert slept an hour longer, it is believed that nothing could have saved her life. (From the Camden, N. J., Courier, February 14, 1906.)

Mrs. Joseph Parfrey, aged 32, of this city, was adjudged insane Monday, and on Tuesday taken to the Mendota hospital at Madison, where she will receive medical treatment. Her insanity is said to be the result of the morphine habit contracted from the use of certain patent medicines which contained the drug. (From The Richland Center, Wis., Observer, February 1, 1906.)

With a cheery smile, Charles C. Wright, assistant manager of the Colonial Life Insurance Company, in this city, chatted with a bartender in a saloon in Market near Nineteenth street yesterday. A few minutes later he lay dead in the rear yard of the building, a victim of cyanide of potassium, taken with suicidal intent.

Ill health, superinduced by a failing heart weakened by the excessive use of powders to ward off severe attacks of neuralgia, is believed by his family to have prompted him to end his life. (From the Philadelphia Press.)

BEWARE OF HEADACHE POWDERS.

Headache powders continue their deadly operations, here and elsewhere. In this city a clergyman from another town was recently found unconscious and was with difficulty revived. It is thought he was the victim of some form of these powders. At York, Pa., on Sunday, Miss Sadie Kemper, 26 years of age, who was to be married in April, died from the effects of a headache powder. Some of these specific drugs may be innocent, but they are to be taken with caution and it is better to consult a physician before indulging in them. There are many forms of headache, as there are of sore throat, and what may be good for one form may not be effective with another. Moreover, there may be constitutional or organic difficulties which in individual cases would make the taking of these powerful drugs exceedingly dangerous. Life and health are too precious to be trifled with through ignorance and presumption. (From the Rochester, N. Y., Chronicle, March 20, 1906.)

DANGEROUS HEADACHE POWDERS.

Because of having taken an unusual quantity of headache capsules, Eugene A. McColly, a well-known business man of Latrobe, had a narrow escape from death Thursday. A woman in Bradenville had a similar experience, and in both cases prompt medical aid was necessary to pull the patients through. (From the Greensburg, Pa., Argus, January 3, 1906.)

AT POINT OF DEATH—TOOK FREE SAMPLES—HERBERT GREATRIX, OF BELLEVILLE, IS DYING AFTER TAKING SAMPLE CATHARTIC SPECIFIC.

As a result, it is alleged, of taking patent medicine which had been distributed around the streets in free samples, Herbert Greatrix, aged 24, is at the point of heath in the hospital. On Wednesday night he took a dose of medicine, which was said to be a cathartic, and on Thursday morning was seized with violent diarrhea. Later he was taken with cramp and vomiting, and Doctor Yeomans advised his removal to the hospital. This morning an operation was performed and the young fellow found to be suffering from rupture of the bowels. His life is despaired of. (From the Winnipeg, Manitoba, Telegram, April 2, 1906.)

Lab. No.	Article.	Determination.
7467	Gray's Catarrh Powder	Contains cocaine.
7468	Crown Catarrh Powder	Do.

7470	Shiloh's Consumption Cure.	Contains chloroform, prussic acid, alcohol, and a tar product. Test for morphine, negative.
7472	Hood's Sarsaparilla	Contains 17.92 per cent of alcohol by volume.
7473	Paine's Celery Compound	Contains 20.24 per cent of alcohol by volume.
7474	Warner's Safe Cure	Contains 15.40 per cent of alcohol by volume.
7475	Antikamnia	Mixture of acetanilid and sodium bicarbonate.
7476	Orangeine	Do.
7593	Piso's Consumption Cure.	Contains chloroform, alcohol, and apparently cannabis indica. No morphine.
7732	Kopp's Baby Friend	Contains morphine.
7808	Kilmer's Swamp Root	Contains 11.17 per cent of alcohol by volume.
7970	Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup	Contains chloroform and morphine.
8093	Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup.	Contains morphine, 0.027 grain sulphate of morphine per ounce. Each bottle holds 1½ ounces, containing $\frac{1}{25}$ grain. One teaspoonful contains 0.0054 grain of morphine.
8107	Dr. Davis's Anti-Headache Powders.	Sample is composed almost entirely of acetanilid.
8129	Dr. King's Consumption Cure.	Contains morphine and chloroform.
8196	Bromo-Seltzer	Contains bromide and acetanilid. Acetanilid equals 8.35 per cent. One heaping teaspoonful weighs 120 grams, containing approximately 10 grains of acetanilid.
8212	Dr. Harper's Cephalgine Brain Food.	Contains acetanilid approximately 5 grains to the dose of 2 drams.
8213	Laxative Bromo-Quinine.	Contains acetanilid (39.82 per cent.) Each tablet weighs 5 grains, 2 directed to be taken as a dose equals 4 grains acetanilid.
8475	Dr. Boschee's German Sirup.	Morphine present; chloroform, none; hydrocyanic acid present (probably derived from wild cherry); sugar sirup present; tar present.
8540	Dr. Mile's new cure for the heart.	Specific gravity, 1.0214; alcohol by volume, 10.38 per cent; alcohol by weight, 8.05 per cent; residue on evaporation, 12.38 per cent (mainly glycerin); mineral matter, 0.33 per cent (mainly iron, and a small amount of lime). None of the ordinary alkaloids present. No artificial coloring present. Sample has a deep green color and is an alcoholic extract of a leaf drug.
9099	Nurses' and Mothers' Treasure.	One 2-ounce bottle contains a sixth of a grain of morphine, equal to slightly over one-hundredth grain per teaspoonful. Dose prescribed on label for child 6 months to 1 year old, one-fourth to one-half teaspoonful.
10163	Dr. Fenner's Cough Honey	Each teaspoonful contains one-eightieth grain of crystallized morphine.
10743	Morphina-Cura Compound.	Contains morphine.
10745	Orrine No. 4	Specific gravity, 1.0771 per cent; alcohol by weight, 25.15 per cent; alcohol by volume, 34.11 per cent; volatile at 100° C., 59.81 per cent; mineral matter, 0.82 per cent. Remarks: Does not contain opium or its alkaloids. The alcohol is present only in sufficient amount to keep vegetable drugs in solution.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 88—the pure-food bill—and had come to no resolution thereon.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the fortifications appropriation bill (H. R. 14171) for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be printed under the rule.

VIEWS OF MINORITY ON PURE-FOOD BILL.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the views of the minority on the pure-food bill. There was a double quantity printed of the majority report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

The views of the minority are as follows:

The undersigned members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, being unable to agree with the report submitted on Senate bill 88, respectfully submit the following reasons why they can not concur in the report:

The power of government to regulate the sale of food products and drugs, prohibit adulteration of the same, prescribe the manner in which they shall be branded, and fix the size and weight of the packages in which such food products and drugs shall be contained is admittedly an exercise of police power. We do not understand or believe, from our conception of the powers of Congress contained and specified in the Constitution of the United States, that Congress has the power or authority to enact police laws for the regulation of the manufacture, sale, or for the prevention of the adulteration of food, except so far as such laws may be made to apply to the District of Columbia, the Territories, and those localities over which Congress has, under the Constitution, exclusive jurisdiction.

While we are in hearty accord with all efforts made for the purpose of having laws enacted to prevent the sale of impure or adulterated foods, or to prevent frauds and impositions upon the people by the sale of impure or adulterated food, we believe that the legislatures of the several States have full power and authority to enact such laws and to protect the people of the various States from fraud and imposition by the sale of impure or adulterated food and drugs. Nearly all of the States have enacted laws on the subject, and are enforcing them. The power to protect the people of the various States in health, in morals, and general welfare is inherent in the States—was reserved to the States by the Constitution, was not delegated to the Congress of the United States, and remains there to be exercised by the States at the will and pleasure of the legislatures of such States.

We do not believe that it is true that the various States have failed or do fail to protect their citizens properly in the matter of impure food. The evidence before the committee is to the contrary. Doctor Wiley, the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, and who has been most ardent, insistent, and influential in advocating the passage of a national law on this subject, in his evidence before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, pages 308, 309 of the hearings, stated:

"Doctor WILEY. By consent, yes, sir; but in these other cases we get a request for certified copies and send them.

"Mr. BARTLETT. Certified copies of what?

"Doctor WILEY. Of the food standards.

"Mr. BARTLETT. What law makes that admissible?

"Doctor WILEY. It is because they were prepared for the advice of food officials and for the information of the courts. That was in the original act under which these were prepared. It was dropped out of the last act, but it was in the original act under which these were prepared, and it was for the use of food officials and for the information of the courts. That is what they were prepared for. Therefore we had a warrant of law to send them out, and the Secretary does that.

"Now, there is a list of the States that have adopted these standards.

"Mr. TOWNSEND. How many of them are there, do you think—about how many?

"Doctor WILEY. Connecticut, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, North Dakota, Nebraska, and a number of others that some of these have been adopted in. Perhaps I had better read them.

"Mr. TOWNSEND. Well, no; I do not care about that.

"Doctor WILEY. It is all down here, Mr. TOWNSEND; that is, the States that have adopted them by act of legislature are stated here, and those that have adopted them by authority conferred on the food commissioner are here.

"Mr. TOWNSEND. I thought you could tell us generally.

"Doctor WILEY. Well, I could not without running over this list, because they are arranged here alphabetically; but all that information is there.

"I have also here the attitude of the States in regard to preservatives—those that forbid and those that permit their use. You will find that useful, because they are all classified, and you can get that readily. These are taken from the copies officially sent to us in compiling the State laws.

"Mr. BARTLETT. Most of the States, if not all, have what they call pure-food laws, and most of them have commissioners—how many of the States?

"Doctor WILEY. Nearly all the States have food laws, and about twenty, or perhaps a few more, of them have provided for the enforcement of those laws. The others are just laws without any methods of enforcement; and, in so far as I know, in those States the laws are not enforced. But where the law provides for a machinery to enforce the law, in most States it is enforced very rigidly. That is all brought out in this statement.

"Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I want. So you say that where they have adopted these food laws and appointed food commissioners or officers to watch the enforcement of them, they are enforced very properly?

"Doctor WILEY. Yes, very efficiently, as far as the State can go. And I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that in every State, I believe, where the statute has previously prescribed the standard, and, of course, required an act of the legislature, I believe in every other case these standards have been adopted by the food commissioners in toto. In fact, one State made a great mistake in adopting the preliminary report we sent out for criticism, thinking it contained the official standards, and now they are in a pickle to know what to do about it. They did not notice that it was only sent out as a preliminary suggestion and not as a standard at all; and of course the standards as finally adopted would be very different from those which were at first proposed, because it is remarkable how we get the information that we want when we send these out and ask for criticisms, and thereby are enabled to construct finally a standard of high efficiency, not absolute accuracy, of course."

Another witness, Mr. Williams, made the following statement, page 15:

"Mr. TOWNSEND. You are familiar with the Michigan law?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

"Mr. TOWNSEND. Doesn't that prohibit you from manufacturing and selling excepting under that label?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

"Mr. BURKE. Did you state in your opening statement that the laws of these three States were substantially the same, and that they conform to the language of this bill?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. I said they were along the same general lines. The principle of the laws to a great extent and the wording of the laws are very similar—or, rather, this being a later production, House bill No. 4527 is very similar to the laws of those three States. The point that I was trying to bring out is that under that language the rulings made by whoever administers the law could be changed in every change of administration. It is not at all likely that any one man is going to live forever and always be at the head of the Department which would administer this law.

"Mr. RICHARDSON. How many of the States have pure-food laws? Don't you know, as a general proposition, that pure-food laws of the different States, as a general practice, are a dead letter in the majority of the States as to the enforcement of them?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not say that.

"Mr. BARTLETT. It does not seem so in Wisconsin.

"Mr. WILLIAMS. It is not a dead letter in the State of Michigan, in Wisconsin, nor Minnesota. It is not a dead letter in North Dakota nor South Dakota. It is not a dead letter in Pennsylvania, nor in Ohio, nor in Illinois, nor in Indiana.

"Mr. RICHARDSON. Is it not a fact that the standards created by the different States with respect to the sale of goods can not be effectually enforced?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. Not without a lot of embarrassment of this kind. You have got to make your goods all alike and label them differently for each State, carrying in your stock of made-up goods a stock for every State in the country doing business. A jobber whose place of business is located on the borders of a State must carry a stock of goods to comply with the laws of those different adjacent States.

"Mr. BURKE. You do not object to the law, but you want it uniform?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. We don't object to it, but we want it so we can comply with it.

"Mr. RICHARDSON. If you had an act of Congress regulating this matter, the States could still enact their own statutes.

"Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe they can.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Do you know of any State where the law is a dead letter?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know. I would also state that the law is actively enforced in Kentucky.

"Mr. RUSSELL. Is there any difference in the enforcement of the law in the various States where you sell the goods?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. No, sir; no marked difference. They all seem to be very active."

One of the purposes of the bill is to enable the manufacturers of food and dealers in food to disregard and violate the laws of the various States on the subject of pure food, and that has been one of the chief influences that have been advocating the enactment of this bill into law. The bill deals purely with questions of police, such as "adulterations in drugs," "adulterations in confectionery," "adulterations in food," "misbranding of packages of food," etc. The bill undertakes to establish standards for food, to prescribe how and in what manner preservatives for food may be used, and, in other words, undertakes to enact into law nothing save those things that are accepted and regarded as police regulations in the sale of food products. It is true that the bill in one section pretends that it does not interfere with the police regulations of the States, but at the same time the same section declares that foods and drugs which comply with the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the State authorities when brought from another State so long as they remain in the original, unbroken packages.

We challenge the right of Congress to enact such a law as this. We deny that Congress has any such power, and insist that under the pretense and guise of regulating commerce Congress can not enact a law which is purely for the purpose of exercising police power within the States. The test which would be applied to the act, if it should become a law, would be whether laws enacted by the States in reference to the subject of food products and drugs which were manufactured in the States or which were brought into the States, whether in original packages or not, for sale could be enforced where such laws conflicted with this act of Congress. The only reason that could be given why the State law would be inoperative would be that this act was passed in pursuance of the power of Congress to regulate commerce and that the laws of the States passed on the same subject were efforts on the part of the State to interfere with commerce.

As we have stated, we do not believe that this bill can be enacted by Congress by reason of its power and authority to regulate commerce among the States, nor do we believe that this act will prevent the States from enforcing such laws as they now have on their statute books, or that they may hereafter pass, for the purpose of protecting the people of the States from fraud and imposition in the matter of impure food or drugs, or prevent the States from themselves establishing standards of foods with which all food products must comply, whether manufactured in the States or brought therein for sale, consumption, or use.

It occurs to us to say that this is but another effort to minimize the powers of the States and to magnify the powers of the General Government, an effort to look to the General Government for the correction of all the ills and evils with which the public may think itself afflicted. We believe that the State legislatures are competent to enact adequate laws on the subject, and that the State officials are both honest and efficient and will enforce the laws. We do not believe that this law will accomplish any more than State laws rigidly enforced would accomplish.

Believing that this is an attempt on the part of the United States to exercise police power within the States, and that it is not a proper exercise of power by Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, we insist that neither the original bill which came from the Senate nor the substitute offered by the committee should pass. Amplifying our reasons, we submit that—

POLICE POWER.

The police power of the States extends to all matters relating to the health, safety, and morals of its citizens and to everything referring to its domestic economy and of the relations of the people to each other and the States.

This was clearly decided by the License cases (5 Howard, 631), per Grier, J., in whose opinion cases on this subject are cited.

See Federalist, No. 45, 216; Passenger cases, 7 Howard, 523, 550;

Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet., 512; License cases, 5 Howard, 589, 631; 6 Greenl., 412; Holmes v. Jennison, 14 Pet., 568; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 203; Mayor, etc., of N. Y., v. Miln., 11 Pet., 133; Brown v. Md., 12 Wheat., 441, 4 Sandf., 492, 5 Howard, 628, 7 Howard, 414, 7 Howard, 417, 1 Black, 603 (66 U. S., XVII, 191), the case of Conway v. Taylor; Austin v. Tennessee, 179 U. S., 343.

The principle sustained in the cases above cited is condensed in the head notes to the case of The Mayor and Aldermen of New York v. Miln. (11 Peters), as follows:

"A State has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, when that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

"It is not only the right but the bounden and solemn duty of a State to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people and to provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation which it may deem conducive to these ends when the powers over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise are not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

"All those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or which may be more properly called "internal police," are not surrendered or restrained, and, consequently, in relation to these the authority of the State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive."

In the opinion rendered by Judge Barbour the statement is made that these positions are considered as "impregnable." In defining what is meant by the "police powers" of the State, the court said:

"Every law came within this description which concerned the welfare of the whole people of a State or any individual within it, whether it related to their rights or duties; whether it respected them as men or as citizens of the State; whether in their public or private relations; whether it related to the rights of persons or of property of the whole people of a State or of any individual within it, and whose operation was within the territorial limits of the State, and upon the persons and things within its jurisdiction * * *."

Congress is without power to legislate (except as to the District of Columbia, the Territories, and insular possessions) on this subject.

That Congress can not exercise this police power so as to make it a crime for any citizen to violate the provisions of this bill in any of the States with reference to branding and labeling food products, or for failing to have the same come up to the standard provided by this bill, is, in our opinion, clearly established by the case of United States v. Henry C. De Witt. (9 Wallace, 41, 45.) In that case De Witt was indicted under the twenty-ninth section of the internal-revenue act, which made it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment to mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or to sell or offer for sale such mixture, or to sell or offer for sale oil made of petroleum for illuminating purposes inflammable at less temperature than 110° F., and the indictment alleged that he offered for sale oil made of petroleum of the description specified in the statute at Detroit, Mich. To this indictment the defendant demurred upon two grounds, to wit: That the first charge in the indictment did not constitute any offense under any valid and constitutional law of the United States, and that the act above quoted was invalid and unconstitutional.

There was a certificate of division of opinion between the circuit judges and the case came to the Supreme Court of the United States upon such certificate of division. The opinion of the court was pronounced by Chief Justice Chase, and the decision is concurred in by all of the judges. In that case the Chief Justice said that the act was so clearly a regulation of police, and that it could only have constitutional operation within the District of Columbia and those localities over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, that it was unnecessary to enter into a detailed discussion of it, and that within the State limits the law could have no constitutional operation. This case is so directly in point and so fully sustains the proposition that the provisions of this bill are mere regulations of police and an effort on the part of Congress to exercise police powers within the limits of the State, which power Congress does not possess, that the following quotation from the opinion is given:

"The question certified resolves itself into this: Has Congress power, under the Constitution, to prohibit trade within the limits of a State?

"That Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the Constitution expressly declares. But this express grant of power to regulate commerce among the States has always been understood as limited by its terms, and as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States; except, indeed, as a necessary and proper means for carrying into execution some other power expressly granted or vested.

"It has been urged in argument that the provision under which this indictment was framed is within this exception; that the prohibition of the sale of the illuminating oil described in the indictment was in aid and support of the internal-revenue tax imposed on other illuminating oils. And we have been referred to provisions, supposed to be analogous, regulating the business of distilling liquors and the mode of packing various manufactured articles; but the analogy appears to fail at the essential point, for the regulations referred to are restricted to the very articles which are the subject of taxation, and are plainly adapted to secure the collection of the tax imposed, while in the case before us no tax is imposed on the oils the sale of which is prohibited. If the prohibition, therefore, has any relation to taxation at all, it is merely that of increasing the production and sale of other oils and, consequently, the revenue derived from them by excluding from the market the particular kind described.

"This consequence is too remote and too uncertain to warrant us in saying that the prohibition is an appropriate and plainly adapted means for carrying into execution the power of laying and collecting taxes. There is, indeed, no reason for saying that it was regarded by Congress as such a means, except that it is found in an act imposing internal duties. Standing by itself it is plainly a regulation of police; and that it was so considered, if not by the Congress which enacted it, certainly by the succeeding Congress, may be inferred from the circumstance that while all special taxes on illuminating oils were repealed by the act of July 20, 1868, which subjected distillers and refiners to the tax on sales as manufactures, this prohibition was left unrepealed.

"As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes, territorially, all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia. Within State limits it can have no constitutional operation. This has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions (License cases, 5 How., 504; Passenger cases, 7 How., 283; License Tax cases, 5 Wall., 470—72 U. S., XVIII, 500—and the cases cited) that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion.

"The first question certified must, therefore, be answered in the negative.

"The second question must also be answered in the negative, except so far as the section named operates within the United States, but without the limits of any State."

This bill by its very title indicates that it is an effort on the part of the United States Congress to enact a police regulation or law, for it is entitled "An act for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein," etc.

If it is a correct statement that this bill is one by which Congress seeks to exercise police power over citizens and property in localities other than those over which it has exclusive jurisdiction, to wit, the District of Columbia, the Territories, and insular possessions, then Congress has no constitutional authority to enact this law. I do not think it can be doubted that under our system of government the police power over citizens and property resides with and belongs to the several States and not to the Federal Government, except so far as Congress can exercise it over the Territories, the District of Columbia, and the insular possessions. It is a power which is inherent in the several States; it is left with them under the Federal system of government; it was reserved to them by the Constitution; it was not granted to the United States by that instrument, nor can it be impliedly conferred upon the General Government, but it is left to the States, and may always be exercised by the State legislatures.

This is so by reason of Article X of the Constitution, which declares that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

Nor is this principally affected by the fourteenth amendment, and Congress can not in pursuance of it exercise power over the affairs of police in the States. The exercise of the police power is inherent in the States, resides there, and is not under the control of the Federal Congress, and this has been repeatedly decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Some of the cases are the following:

United States v. Dewitt (9 Wall., 41), where it is stated that this principle is so well fixed as to be beyond all controversy.

License cases, 5 Howard, 621; Passenger cases, 7 Howard, 283; Barbier v. Connelly, 113 U. S., 27; License Tax cases, 5 Wallace, 470; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214; United States v. Cruikshanks, 92 U. S., 542; Wilkinson v. Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545; Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 205.

In the case last cited the court said that this was legislation which "can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves."

In the case of the United States v. Dewitt, supra, which was a case where Congress had passed an act prohibiting the sale of certain kinds of oil, or of oil unable to undergo a fire test, and Dewitt was indicted for the sale of oil prohibited by the act of Congress, it was held that such act was plainly a police regulation relating exclusively to the internal trade of the State and therefore beyond the power of Congress to pass. It could therefore be operative only within the District of Columbia. (See also Civil Rights case, 109 U. S., 3; Slaughterhouse cases, 16 Wallace, 36.)

In the case of Cruikshanks et al. (92 U. S., 542) the Supreme Court say:

"The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States and it remains there."

POWER OF THE STATES TO PROTECT THE PEOPLE FROM IMPOSITION OR FRAUDS IN THE MATTER OF FOODS.

The States have the power to punish for a violation of the States' laws prohibiting the manufacture or sale of any article of food made in imitation of the pure or genuine article which it may seek to imitate or which may be made or offered for sale within the limits of the States, whether offered for sale in original packages or not, after being brought into any one State from another State.

In other words, any person offering for sale an article of food made in imitation of the genuine article or falsely branded or marked, brought or transported from one State to another, when it arrives within the limits of a State whose laws prohibit the manufacture or sale of such article, is subject to the laws of the State where he offers such imitation food product for sale, even though he offers it for sale in the original package.

The "commerce clause" of the Constitution of the United States will not protect such a person from being amenable to the police laws of such State.

The case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 461) sustains the exclusive right of the State to pass and enforce laws for the protection of the health and morals of its people and to prevent the sale of articles of food manufactured in or brought from another State. The Supreme Court of the United States decided in that case that the statute of Massachusetts to prevent deception in the manufacture and sale of butter, and which provided that it should be unlawful for any person to manufacture, sell, or offer for sale, or to have in his possession with intent to sell any oleomargarine manufactured in imitation of yellow butter, was clearly within the power of the State to enact.

In that case it was admitted that the article sold had been sent by the manufacturers thereof, in the State of Illinois, to the defendant, who was the agent of the manufacturers in the State of Massachusetts, and that it was sold by him in the original package, and that all the requirements of the act of Congress regulating the sale of oleomargarine had been complied with. Notwithstanding that oleomargarine was authorized to be sold and manufactured by the laws of the United States under the act of Congress of August 2, 1886, and notwithstanding that it was sold by Plumley in Massachusetts in the original package, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the State of Massachusetts had the right, through its legislature, to make it a crime for anyone to sell oleomargarine manufactured in imitation of butter, even though the sale was had of the oleomargarine while in the original unbroken package.

To quote from the decision:

"If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State.

"But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. For, as said by this court in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S., 99, 103): 'In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. And it may be said generally that the legislation of the State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit.'

"But the case most relied on by the petitioner to support the proposition that oleomargarine, being a recognized article of commerce, may be introduced into a State and there sold in original packages, without any restriction being imposed by the State upon such sale, is Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100).

"The majority of the court in that case held that ardent spirits, distilled liquors, ale and beer were subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, and being articles of commerce, their sale while in the original packages in which they are carried from one State to another State could not without the assent of Congress be forbidden by the latter State; that the parties in that case who took beer from Illinois into Iowa had the right under the Constitution of the United States, to sell it in Iowa in such original packages, any statute of that State to the contrary notwithstanding; and that Iowa had no control over such beer until the original packages were broken and the beer in them became mingled in the common mass of property within its limits. 'Up to that point of time,' the court said, 'we hold that in the absence of Congressional permission to do so, the State had no power to interfere by seizure, or any other action in prohibition of importation and sale by the foreign or nonresident importer.' (Page 124.)

"It is sufficient to say of Leisy v. Hardin that it did not in form or in substance present the particular question now under consideration. The article which the majority of the court in that case held could be sold in Iowa in original packages, the statute of that State to the contrary notwithstanding, was beer manufactured in Illinois and shipped to the former State to be there sold in such packages. So far as the record disclosed, and so far as the contentions of the parties were concerned, the article there in question was what it appeared to be, viz, genuine beer, and not a liquid or drink colored artificially so as to cause it to look like beer. The language we have quoted from Leisy v. Hardin must be restrained in its application to the case actually presented for determination, and does not justify the broad contention that a State is powerless to prevent the sale of articles manufactured in or brought from another State, and subjects of traffic and commerce, if their sale may cheat the people into purchasing something that they do not intend to buy, and which is wholly different from what its condition and appearance import.

"At the term succeeding the decision in Leisy v. Hardin this court in Rahrer's case (140 U. S., 545–546) sustained the validity of the act of Congress of August 8, 1890 (c. 728, 26 Stat., 313), known as the 'Wilson Act,' and in the light of the decision in Leisy v. Hardin, said, by the chief justice, that 'the power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States and essentially exclusive,' and that 'it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government.'

"In Railroad Company v. Huson, above cited, the court, speaking generally, said that the police power of the State extended to the making of regulations 'promotive of domestic order, morals, health, and safety.' It was there held, among other things, to be 'within the range of legislative action to define the mode and manner in which everyone may so use his own as not to injure others,' and that 'the police powers of a State justified the adoption of precautionary measures against social evils,' and the enactment of such laws as would have 'immediate connection with the protection of persons and property against the noxious acts of others.'

"It has therefore been adjudged that the States may legislate to prevent the spread of crime, and may exclude from their limits paupers, convicts, persons likely to become a public charge, and persons afflicted with contagious or infectious disease. These and other like things, having immediate connection with the health, morals, and safety of the people, may be done by the States in the exercise of the right of self-defense; and yet it is supposed that the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing that it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought by people in every condition of life are protected by the Constitution in making a sale of it, against the will of the State in which it is offered for sale, because of the circumstance that it is an original package and has become a subject of ordinary traffic.

"We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its markets any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated, so as to cause it to look like an article of food in the general use, and the sale of which may, by reason of such coloration or adulteration, cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public. The deception against which the statute of Massachusetts is aimed is an offense against society, and the States are as competent to protect their people against such offenses or wrongs as they are to protect them against crimes or wrongs of more serious character, and this protection may be given without violating any right secured by the national Constitution and without infringing the authority of the General Government. A State enactment forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food in general use among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to citizens of the United States nor in any just sense interfere with the freedom of commerce among the several States. It is legislation which 'can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves.' (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1–203.)

"We are not unmindful of the fact—indeed, this court has often had occasion to observe—that the acknowledged power of the States to protect the morals, the health, and safety of their people by appropriate legislation sometimes touches, in its exercise, the line separating the respective domains of national and State authority; but in view of the complex system of government which exists in this country, "presenting," as this court, speaking by Chief Justice Marshall, has said, "the rare and difficult scheme of one general government, whose action extends over the whole, but which possesses certain enumerated powers, and of numerous State governments, which retain and exercise all powers not delegated to the Union," the judiciary of the United States should not strike down a legislative enactment of a State—especially if it has direct connection with the social order, the health, and the morals of its people—unless such legislation plainly and palpably violates some right granted or secured by the national Constitution or encroaches upon the authority delegated to the United States for the attainment of objects of national concern."

CROSSMAN V. LURMAN, 192 U. S., AFFIRMS PLUMLEY V. MASSACHUSETTS, 155 U. S.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Crossman v. Lurman, in an opinion pronounced by Justice White, from which there was no dissent, reaffirmed and upheld the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, in the 155 U. S. R., 462, and although Chief Justice Fuller, Mr. Justice Field, and Mr. Justice Brewer dissented in the Plumley case, neither the Chief Justice nor Mr. Justice Brewer, who were on the bench when the case of Crossman v. Lurman was decided, made dissent.

It will be observed by reading the dissenting opinion in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts that the dissent of the Chief Justice was placed mainly upon the ground that the State of Massachusetts had excluded from commerce a food product which was wholesome, palatable, nutritious, and in no way deleterious to the public health. In the Plumley case it was decided that "the States did have and ought to have plenary control over the protection of the people against frauds and deception in the sale of food products." "Such legislation may, indeed," said the court, "directly or indirectly affect trade in such products transported from one State into another State, but that circumstances does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States."

The court further said in that case that—

"The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in the conservation of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive—and—

"it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government."

The court also said—

"that legislation forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to citizens of the United States, nor in a just sense interfere with the freedom of commerce among the several States. It is legislation which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves."

In upholding a statute of the State of New York which prohibited the sale of adulterated food products, and in deciding that it was not repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that it was a valid exercise of the police power of the State, the court declared that the assertion that that statute was repugnant to the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States was devoid of merit, and in so deciding cited with approval the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts, in the following language:

"Indeed, every contention here urged to show that the law of New York is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States was fully and expressly considered and negatived by the decision of this court in Plumley v. Massachusetts, supra. In that case the law of the State of Massachusetts forbidding the sale of oleomargarine, which was artificially colored, was applied to a sale in Massachusetts of an original package of that article which had been manufactured in and shipped from the State of Illinois. In the course of a full review of the previous cases relating to the subject it was said, page 472:

"'If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidently affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the powers of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. For, as said by this court in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S. 99, 103): "In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution.

"'"And it may be said generally that the legislation of a State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly or remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit."'

"Again it was said, page 478:

"'And yet it is supposed that the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing that it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought by people in every condition of life are protected by the Constitution in making a sale of it against the will of the State in which it is offered for sale, because of the circumstance that it is an original package and has become a subject of ordinary traffic. We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its market any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may, by reason of such coloration or adulteration, cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public.'"

INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Hon. J. Randolph Tucker, of Virginia, an eminent lawyer and formerly a Member of Congress, in a paper read before the American Bar Association in 1888, on the subject "Congressional power over interstate commerce," said:

"I think to obtain the true view of this difficult class of questions may justify me in more critical analysis of the related powers of Congress and the States in respect to them.

"Congress has power to regulate, not persons and things, but commerce in them quoad the commerce—traffic, intercourse, etc., Congress has clear power. As to the things and persons when not in commerce, the States have a clearly reserved power. Before things become articles of commerce, interstate or foreign, State power is supreme. After they become such and while they are articles of such commerce Congress has power to exclude State action (Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S., 623, and Bowman v. R. R. Co., 125 U. S., 495). States legislate as to things and persons; Congress only as to interstate and foreign commerce in the things or persons.

"This clear but nice and subtle distinction is as old as Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat.), and Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat.).

"The boundary line between State and Federal power is set up by the Constitution; the courts have only to find its location and keep up the fence between them.

"Thus a tax by Congress on the salary of a State judge was held void, because it was not necessary or proper for Congress thus to trench upon State autonomy. (Collector v. Day, 11 Wallace.)

"So inspection laws of States operate on things before they become objects of commerce and are beyond the reach of Congressional action. (Gibbons v. Ogden, and cases cited supra.) Quarantine laws are for State action and Congress has always conformed to them. Commerce stops with the shore; the reception of the articles is determinable by the State, if within its power, over the health, life, and safety of its citizens.

"In the last decided case, Bowman v. Railroad Company, supra, Iowa's right to stop the shipment of goods for transportation from Illinois to Iowa was insisted on. It was defined by the court, because Iowa forbade the transitus of an article while a subject of commerce. It was not decided that Iowa might not forbid its use or sale when it reached its terminus and ceased to be in commercial transition. When it doffs the commercial garb and dons that of a mere thing of property it ceases to be a subject of commercial regulation by Congress and becomes a subject of State power. As mere property it is under State power. But when it moves toward another State or a foreign country its transitus is under Congressional regulation. Unless in its motion it violates the police power of the States Congress guards, guides, and protects it to its destination. When that is reached it drops again from the hands of Congress into the hands under the power of the State.

"But here it may be asked, Can Congress invest by commercial regulation an article with the quality of property which the State declares shall not have such quality? Could Congress have authorized a slave to be transported into a State which makes slavery illegal? Could Congress authorize dynamite or gunpowder to be carried in open cars through a State which forbids it because a peril to life and property?

"Such questions bring into apparent collision the commerce power and the police power of the States.

"The solution may be found in the fact that no commercial regulation can be constitutional which is not necessary and proper; and none can be necessary or proper which exposes to disease and death or slavery the people who live in a State under the reservation of its protective power.

"And if it is objected that a State upon this view may thus transcend the bounds of its power to protect its people, the answer is that when the judicial department, whose duty it is to keep up the fence between granted and reserved power, finds that a State mala fide makes its police power the pretext to regulate or prohibit commerce, or that Congress under the commerce power mala fide invades the reserved police power of the State, it shall so adjudge, and maintain in both cases, the supreme law of the land over Congress and the States.

"And this view avoids what, I must with deference say, seems to me to be an inaccurate mode of statement—that a tax on interstate commerce by a State is a regulation of commerce, and therefore void, because of the exclusiveness of the power of Congress to regulate it. * * *

"In the exercise of the police powers as to health and the like; as to bridges, wharves, and the like; as to pilotage, etc., and as to the removal of obstructions in rivers, bays, etc., the State has these powers as a part of its police reservation for the life and property of its people engaged in commerce. In this the State only protects the person and property; it does not regulate the transitus. These it may, as we have seen, exercise freely and bona fide, so as not to obstruct the freedom of commerce secured by the higher authority of the Constitution. To regulate may and should be to help and facilitate commerce, not to obstruct it; and the obstruction, as I have insisted, of free commerce between the States established by the Constitution is not a lawful exercise of the power to regulate commerce by Congress, nor of the police power by the States.

"The Constitution makes trade free between the States. No power can obstruct it. A State can not, nor can Congress, so exercise its powers as to do so. Hence, though a tax by a State on interstate commerce is void, it is so because it obstructs the freedom of that commerce established by the Constitution, and not because it is itself a regulation of commerce. It is not such regulation, for if it were it would follow that Congress could tax it, which, for reasons already urged and hereafter set forth, I deny.

"The 'immense mass of legislation' (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1) which belongs to the States, called police powers, for want of a better name, are limitations upon the commercial power of Congress. These police powers, as I have endeavored to show, are not regulations of commerce. They are distinct and different from these. But the regulations of Congress and these police powers spread over the same objects. But both may exist without repugnance, and must be made to consist in the fair and just efficiency of each. While the police powers must not trench upon the regulations of commerce, these must be made to respect the health and other police laws of the States. Commerce should flourish, but must not carry disease to the people. A State bridge may cross a navigable stream, but so as not to obstruct commerce. These are all cases not of rival commercial regulations, but the constitutional coexistence in consistent force, of the commercial power of Congress and the reserved autonomy of the State as to its internal polity.

"I may venture to say that property in transitu from one State to another through a third could not be obstructed by the laws of the latter; and this seems to be involved in many of the later decisions of the Supreme Court. The State can not obstruct the transitus, for that is commerce; but it may legislate on the thing or person when its transitus being ended it remains within its borders."

Mr. Tuckner was not only an able and eminent lawyer, but also the author of a work upon the Constitution of the United States which is acknowledged and accepted as authority upon that subject by the courts; hence his views on the subject treated of by him herein quoted are entitled to much respect.

Former United States Senator George, of Mississippi, who was admitted to be one of the most learned and eminent lawyers who ever served in the Senate, while a member of the Judiciary Committee, made two reports on the subject of interstate commerce and the police powers of the States. We incorporate them as the views of that most distinguished and able lawyer, and believe that they are entitled to and will receive due consideration.

In the Fiftieth Congress Mr. George submitted the following from the Committee on the Judiciary:

[Senate Report No. 610, Fiftieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1067) relating to imported liquors, for examination of the constitutional questions involved, beg leave to report:

The object of the bill is to subject to the laws of the several States through whose ports importations of ardent spirits or intoxicating liquors are made the rights of the importer as to the disposition of the same.

If the bill should become a law, it would result that though Congress allows the importation of such liquors upon the payment of the duty levied, yet the right of the importer to sell or dispose of them in the original package would be subject to prohibition or regulation in each State into which the importation may be made, according to its own will. In some States the importer might freely sell; in others he would not be allowed to sell at all; and in others the sale would be restricted by license fees or other taxation, as each State might adjudge was best for itself.

The question whether a State, in the exercise of its police powers, can restrict or prohibit the sale of imported intoxicants is not submitted for our examination. The bill proceeds on the theory that the powers of the States are ineffectual to prevent such importation and subsequent sale by the importer, and seeks the permission of Congress to effect that end. Our inquiry, therefore, is restricted to the ascertainment of the powers of Congress to modify and change the constitutional effect of the laws of the United States authorizing importation so that this effect should be as diverse as the laws the several States might enact.

The theory of constitutional law on which the bill is based is expressed in the following quotation from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, in the License cases (5 How., 504), in which that great judge stated and affirmed the doctrine announced by the court through Chief Justice Marshall in Ward v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 112):

"That an article authorized by a law of Congress to be imported continued to be a part of the foreign commerce of the country while it remained in the hands of the importer, for sale in the original bale, package, or vessel in which it was imported. That the authority given to import necessarily carried with it the right to sell the imported article in the form and shape in which it was imported, and that no State, either by direct assessment or by requiring a license from the importer before he was permitted to sell, could impose any burden on him or the property imported beyond what the law of Congress had itself imposed, but that when the original package was broken up, for use or for retail, by the importer, and also when the commodity had passed into the hands of a purchaser, it ceased to be an import or a part of foreign commerce and became subject to the laws of the State, and might be taxed for State purposes and the sale regulated by the State, like any other property."

The theory of the bill also recognizes the principle that intoxicants are legitimate objects of foreign commerce, and as such are within the power of Congress to regulate. This theory is thus expressed by Chief Justice Taney in the License cases (5 How., 504):

"Spirits and distilled liquors are universally admitted to be subjects of ownership and property, and are therefore the subjects of exchange, barter, and traffic, like any other commodity in which a right of property exists. And Congress, under its general power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, may prescribe what articles of merchandise shall be admitted and what excluded, and may therefore admit or not, as it shall seem best, the importation of ardent spirits. And inasmuch as the laws of Congress authorize their importation, no State has a right to prohibit their introduction."

Assuming this theory to be correct, it results that there is no difference in the power of Congress to regulate foreign commerce on ardent spirits and in their power of regulation over any other article of commerce. All objects of commerce, so far as the power of regulation by Congress is concerned, are exactly on the same footing. We may dismiss, therefore, in considering the constitutionality of the bill, the incident that this particular commodity may be injurious to the health and morals of the people as wholly immaterial. Congress, it is true, in forming a regulation of commerce with reference to intoxicants, may properly consider their injurious effect in use, and may form the regulation with reference to that effect. But having imposed a tax on the importation, and thereby recognized spirits as legitimate commodities of foreign commerce, the regulation of commerce on them must be governed by the same constitutional rules as apply to all foreign commerce.

It has been seen that an imported article remains a part of foreign commerce so long as it remains in the hands of the importer in the same shape and form in which it was imported. A prohibition or restriction on its sale whilst thus conditioned, made by State authority, would therefore be a regulation of foreign commerce by the State, and, as we have seen, would not be permissible under the Constitution. Can Congress give this power of regulation to the States? The answer to this would seem to be too plain for controversy. The dividing line between State and Federal powers is fixed by the Constitution. That instrument, the supreme law of the land, specifies what is granted, and thus fixes also what is reserved. A State can not enlarge the powers of Congress even in its own limits. This would be a surrender to that extent of its constitutional equality with the other States.

The Constitution has formed and was intended to perpetuate a Union of equal States, equal in political dignity and in political power, and no diversity in these respects is possible. If it be true that Congress can not, in pursuance of the Constitution and without any assent of a particular State or States, make a regulation as to the sale of imported goods still remaining a part of foreign commerce, different in some States from the regulation in the other States, it must follow that no such different regulation can be established in the States which shall consent to it.

It is equally clear that Congress can not part with or delegate to a

State any power which has not been reserved to it. Congress can not return to the States a power given by the Constitution to Congress; much more can not Congress delegate or surrender a granted power to any portion of the States, for that would pro tanto invest those States with powers not possessed by the others. We may safely rest, therefore, on the conclusion that this bill is unconstitutional in submitting the foreign commerce named in it to regulation by State laws, unless we find that Congress may, without any aid from State laws, make different regulations as to importations in different States. We are thus brought face to face with this proposition, that Congress has power to enact that a particular imported article, after payment of duties according to law and still in the hands of the importer and in the original package, and therefore still a part of foreign commerce, may be freely sold in some States and in others shall not be sold at all, or sold only with burdensome restrictions.

To that proposition thus expressed we are confident that none would assent. Such a law would not only contravene that provision of the Constitution which requires impost taxation to be uniform throughout the Union, but also that provision which prohibits Congress from giving by any regulation of commerce a preference to the ports of one State over those of another. It would destroy uniformity in taxation, because in one State the payment of the impost tax would include in it as its rightful and necessary effect the right to sell, and in the other it would include no such right.

Taxation to be uniform, as required by the Constitution, must not only be the same in amount on the same thing, but payment of it must be followed by the same legal consequences. A preference is given to the ports of one State over the ports of another by a regulation of commerce when, by a law of Congress, importations into the ports of the one upon payment of the duty may be sold and in the other they may not. That the State discriminated against consents to the discrimination can make no difference, as we have seen. It is not in the power of a State to give force and validity even within its own borders to an act of Congress passed in violation of the Constitution.

There is one other aspect necessary to be considered. It being shown, as we think it has been, that Congress can pass no such law, and that the States can pass no such law, and that Congress can not delegate to the State the power to pass such a law, and that a State can not invest Congress with the power of enacting such a law, to be operative only within its own borders, we have now further to inquire whether the conjoint action of a State and of the Congress can make such a law valid within the limits of the State. There is such a thing in the Constitution as concurrent powers in the several States and in the United States, whereby each sovereignty may legislate independently on the same subject. But these powers are of that kind where conjoint action is not contemplated. The concurrent power of the State is subordinate and can only be exercised when not in conflict with the law of Congress, which is supreme. This is not a case of that kind, for here neither has independently any power whatever.

There are a few conjoint powers specified in the Constitution; that is, certain reserved powers of the States are not reserved to them absolutely, but only to be exercised by the consent of Congress.

Among these is the power to levy imposts and duties, the net proceeds of which are to go into the Treasury of the United States; making compacts between two or more States; laying duties of tonnage; keeping troops and ships of war in time of peace. But among these is not included the power claimed in this bill. The power here claimed is a power denied both to the States and to Congress; and the effect of the bill is to create a constitutional power by the joint action of two parties to both of which it is prohibited. This we confidently assert can not be done.

It is no answer to this reasoning that Congress has enacted section 3247 of the Revised Statutes. The power therein exercised by Congress is in reference to things purely internal and domestic in the States—a power of internal taxation—and not the same power as is attempted to be exercised in this bill. If it is the same power, however, it has been proven to be unconstitutional.

As before stated, we express no opinion as to the power of the States, without any aid from Congress, to prohibit the sale of imported intoxicants by the importers in the original packages. If they have such power, there is no need of this bill, the sole object of which is to confer the power.

The bill is improper, if not unconstitutional, if considered as a declaration merely by Congress that such power exists in the States. That is purely a judicial question. The Congress can enact laws—they can not expound them. Necessarily in enacting a law on any given subject Congress determines that they have jurisdiction and power to legislate over that subject. But this determination is the necessary incident of enacting a statute which of itself becomes a rule of action, the framing of the rule, not the exposition of the Constitution, being the end sought to be attained. The settling of the meaning of the Constitution is not a legitimate object of legislative power.

Besides, the Congress can only exercise the powers granted, and those necessary and proper for carrying into effect the vested powers. If it be conceded, as we have shown it to be, that the power to pass the bill as a rule of action, as a law, is not in Congress, then it is also shown that it may not be passed as a declaratory act, since such act is not necessary or proper for carrying into effect any power granted to the United States.

We repeat, that in the matter submitted to us no question arises as to the extent of the police powers of the States to prevent the introduction of intoxicants, or their subsequent sale by the importer. The bill is framed on the theory, as we have seen, that it may be no such power exists in the States, its sole object being to confer it. Our conclusion goes no further than to deny that such power can be conferred. However desirable it may be to diminish, or prohibit entirely, the use of intoxicants, that end can only be reached by constitutional methods.

It should not be overlooked that the province of State control over what concerns the police regulation of domestic health, peace, and general good order and well-being within each State is, under the Constitution, as secure against intrusion from Federal authority as the regulation of foreign commerce by the General Government is from encroachment upon that province by State authority. It is not desirable that Federal legislation should seem, by inference even, necessary to impart or maintain aid or protection to the State's exercise of its authority within the province of State domestic control. The State and the Federal control in the premises are divided by the Constitution, and neither for its vigor depends upon the other. The experience of the wise administration hitherto of this judicial question, in defining these respective provinces, in the opinion of the committee, makes it best to leave this, as it now is, a judicial question, in the highest interest of both the Federal regulation of commerce and the State control of its police authority.

In the Fifty-first Congress the same bill came before the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. That committee made a report favorable to the passage of the bill, and Mr. George submitted his views, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 993, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

VIEWS OF MR. GEORGE.

In the Fiftieth Congress the bill before us was considered by this committee, and a conclusion reached by a majority that it was unconstitutional. The basis of this opinion as stated in the report was that Congress had no power to grant a jurisdiction to a State which was by the Constitution vested in the Federal Government. The committee thought that the division of power between the States and the Federal Government was fixed by the Constitution and could not be changed either by the action of Congress alone or by the conjoint action of Congress and any State in which it was attempted to vest a part of this power delegated to Congress.

The committee did not consider that any question relating to the power of the State to deal with intoxicating liquors under their reserved power was submitted for their consideration, and for that reason they expressly declined to express any opinion on that subject.

Since that time the Supreme Court has determined that the reserved powers of the States did not authorize them to prohibit the sale of imported intoxicating liquors within their respective limits, and that Congress might grant to a State the power thus denied to them. We are now called upon to act upon this bill after a decision of the Supreme Court overruling the opinion then entertained by the committee as to the power of Congress to donate a power to the States, and also at variance with the views entertained by the undersigned as to the extent of the reserved powers of the States.

Under these differing circumstances, the question of donating this power to the States is presented for our consideration. If we adhere to the opinion expressed in the former report, we do so in direct conflict with the decision of that tribunal appointed by the Constitution to determine authoritatively the extent of the delegated and reserved powers. And so if the undersigned adheres in practice to the opinion that the reserved powers of the States are ample to control and prohibit the sale of imported intoxicants, he would vainly insist on a jurisdiction which, under the decision of the Supreme Court, no State would be allowed to exercise. It is his duty, therefore, to conform his action to the decision of the court.

The court having decided that the power may be delegated by Congress to the several States, the only question left is as to the expediency of the exercise of the power.

The undersigned, though yielding obedience to the decision of the court, entertains the opinion that the States have, under the Constitution, the power yielded by this bill, and that this power in the States is necessary for their welfare and even to the proper working of our complex political system.

It is certain that Congress can not exercise the police power of regulating the traffic in intoxicants within the several States, and the Supreme Court has denied this power to the States, except as to liquors manufactured within their respective limits. So that unless we agree that Congress shall grant this power to the several States as decided by the Supreme Court may be done, then there remains no power by which this police regulation may be made or enforced as far as imported liquors are concerned whilst they are in the original packages.

The Supreme Court has assented to the power of the several States to regulate, control, and prohibit the sale of intoxicants manufactured within their respective limits as a necessary police power, but denies this power as to intoxicants imported from another State or from a foreign country. The result is that however harmful a State may determine the traffic in intoxicants to be, the power to prohibit it is restricted to such liquors only as are manufactured in its borders. Foreigners and citizens of other States may, under this new law, invade a State with their intoxicants, dispose of them in their original packages, and thus carry on a business which the State has determined is destructive to the peace and good order of the community and to the health and morals of the people.

In this singular and anomalous condition has the State been placed by the decision of the Supreme Court.

The court, however, has allowed a means of correction by affirmative action on the part of Congress, granting permission to the State to deal with imported intoxicants in the same way and to the same extent as they may deal with liquors manufactured within their respective limits.

The undersigned believes the true rule to be to concede the power to the States as a power reserved under the Constitution, and not require them, as the Supreme Court has decided, to hold it as a Congressional grant, and therefore subject to the will of Congress to give it in the first instance and afterwards to withdraw it. Yet, as he deems it a power reserved to the States under the Constitution and one necessary to the maintenance of a rightful authority by the States over their own domestic affairs, he feels constrained to support the bill, since only by such legislation can the States, under the decision of the Supreme Court, exercise their rightful and necessary jurisdiction over a subject of the utmost importance to their welfare.

The undersigned expresses no opinion as to the propriety of the exercise of this power by the several States. That is not a matter for Congressional consideration. Whether there shall be a free or a regulated traffic in intoxicants, or total prohibition, is a matter for each State to determine for itself. It is not a matter either of Congressional action or advice.

Believing that the Supreme Court, by its decision in Leisy & Co. v. Hardin, erroneously denied to the States the power conceded to them by this bill, the undersigned gives support to the bill as the only means left whereby the States may exercise their rightful authority over a matter of the utmost gravity and concern to them. The result attained by this action on the part of Congress is the same, so long as Congress shall yield the power, as if the constitutional power of the States to act as they saw proper had been recognized. It is a matter of sincere regret that the States are compelled to rely on Congress for a grant of this essential power. It is also to be deplored that the Constitution has been authoritatively construed so as to reverse the well-recognized rule that Congress is the grantee of powers from the State, and is not the source of power which may be parceled out at its will to the States. Yet, finding the Constitution thus construed as to this particular matter by the tribunal which is appointed as the final arbiter in such matters, the States must submit to hold the power at the will of Congress until such time as the court, upon being better advised, shall reverse its action.

J. Z. GEORGE.

STANDARDS OF FOOD.

The bill provides that the standards of food which may be established shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, aided by the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and the committee of standards of the Association of State Dairy and Food Departments. This provision, contained in section 9 of the bill, will not accomplish the purpose intended, because if the Secretary of Agriculture should establish a standard for food products and any State into which such food products may be transported should establish a different standard, as the State would have a right to do, the standard fixed by the law of the State where the food is sold or offered for sale would control.

In other words, the Congress of the United States can not, by this bill enacted into law, establish a standard for food products which will prevent the States from enforcing compliance with such standards for food products as the legislatures of the States may prescribe for the several States. Therefore the purpose of the bill—i. e., to have a uniform standard for food—will fail. As has already been stated, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Crossman v. Lurman (192 U. S., 189), decided that the standard for food products established by the legislature of New York for the State of New York would prevail over the standard fixed for food products by the act of Congress, and that Congress could not, by fixing a standard for food products imported into the United States, deprive the States of their police power of regulating the sale of food products within the States.

In that case the Supreme Court say:

"It is urged that, even although there was power in the State of New York to legislate on the subject of adulteration of food, such legislation ceased to be operative as regards food products imported into the United States through the channels of foreign commerce after the passage of the act of Congress approved August 30, 1890, 'providing for the inspection of means for exportation, prohibiting the importation of adulterated articles of food or drink, and authorizing the President to make proclamation in certain cases.' (26 Stat., 414.) The second section of that act, it is insisted, does not exclude from importation adulterated food, but simply adulterated food which is mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, drug, or other ingredient injurious to health, which it is urged was not the case with the coffee in question. The language of the section upon which this contention is based is as follows:

"'That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any adulterated or unwholesome food or drug, or any vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, adulterated or mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, drug, or other ingredient injurious to health.'

"We think it unnecessary to determine whether the statute lends even color to the proposition, since we think it is clear that its effect, whatever be its import, was not to deprive the State of its police powers to legislate for the benefit of its people in the prevention of deception and fraud, and thus to control sales made within the State of articles so adulterated as to come within the valid prohibition of the State's statute."

If it be the law, as was stated in this last-mentioned case, that, notwithstanding the fact that Congress had fixed a standard for food imported into the United States, and notwithstanding that the officials of the United States authorized to inspect the food thus imported had approved of such imported food as having complied with the law, the States have the right under their police power to fix another and different standard, and that food when offered for sale or delivered in the States should come up to the standard fixed by the States, then this bill, which endeavors to fix a national food standard for all food products in the United States when shipped from one State to another must fail in its purpose, because whenever any of the States shall fix or prescribe a different standard the manufacturers of the food products must comply with the laws of the State where such food is manufactured or offered for sale.

Congress has already, by act approved June 3, 1902, authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to establish standards of food and food products, and to determine what are regarded as adulterations therein for the guidance of the officials of the various States and the courts of justice. And the Secretary, in pursuance of that act, on November 21, 1903, issued a circular proclaiming standards for purity of food products, together with their definitions, as the official standards of these food products for the United States. That proclamation is as follows:

Original proclamation of standards and letter of transmittal.

[Circular No. 10, Secretary's Office.]

Whereas the Congress of the United States, by an act approved June 3, 1902, authorized the Secretary of Agriculture to establish standards of purity for food products; and

Whereas he was empowered by this act to consult with the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and other experts in determining the standards; and

Whereas he has, in accordance with the provisions of the act, availed himself of the counsel and advice of these experts and of the trade interests touching the products for which standards have been determined and has reached certain conclusions based on the general principles of examination and conduct hereinafter mentioned:

Therefore I, James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, do hereby proclaim and establish the following standards for purity of food products, together with their precedent definitions, as the official standards of these food products for the United States of America.

JAMES WILSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., November 21, 1903.

The various State legislatures have in many instances passed laws to conform to these standards, and doubtless many more will do so. In our opinion, this will be all the law necessary or proper for Congress to pass on the subject.

If anything at all is needed in the way of legislation to enable the States to effectually enforce their laws upon the subject of food, food products, and drugs, and to prevent the sale of impure foods or the fraudulent branding of food products or drugs, then all that is needed is for Congress to enact a law which would subject such food products or drugs to the police laws of the various States whenever they are transported into the States for sale or use in the same way that the act of August 8, 1890, made spirituous liquors and beer subject to the laws of the States when transported therein for use or consumption, and, to that end, we suggest that House bill No. 16248 would meet the present demands for pure-food legislation.

That bill is as follows:

[H. R. 16248, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.]

"A bill to limit the effect of the regulations of commerce between the several States and with foreign commerce in the case of foods and drugs.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act all articles of food or drugs transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation of and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such food or drugs had been produced or manufactured in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages.

"SEC. 2. That the term 'food' as used herein shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionary, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound; that the term 'drugs' shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary for internal or external use, and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or pervention of disease of either man or other animals."

We therefore offer this bill as a substitute for both the Senate bill and the House substitute, believing that if Congress shall enact the same it will do all that Congress is authorized to do under the Constitution and will fully protect the people of the United States, or at least will leave to the people of the various States, through their legislatures, the duty of protecting the people of the States from frauds and impositions in the matter of food products. This is where the Constitution of the United States places the power of protecting the people of the States in their health, safety, and morals, and will not destroy the powers of the States, and will not convert Congress into a legislature for the enactment of purely police laws for the various States of the Union.

The Speaker of the House, Hon. JOSEPH G. CANNON, on the 16th of February, 1906, before the Union League Club, of Philadelphia, gave utterance to some views and sentiments which we so heartily approve that we deem it not amiss to incorporate them here. They were as follows:

REPUBLIC'S GREATEST DANGER.

"In my judgment the greatest danger to the Republic comes from the citizen who refuses or neglects to participate in governing in local, State, and national affairs and seeks protection from the government to which he does not contribute according to his ability or means. In my judgment the danger now to us is not the weakening of the Federal Government, but rather the failure of the forty-five sovereign States to exercise, respectively, their function, their jurisdiction, touching all matters not granted to the Federal Government. This danger does not come from the desire of the Federal Government to grasp power not conferred by the Constitution, but rather from the desire of citizens of the respective States to cast upon the Federal Government the responsibility and duty that they should perform.

"If the Federal Government continues to centralize, we will soon find that we will have a vast bureaucratic government, which will prove inefficient, if not corrupt.

"The governor of one of the States has within a few days written to a Senator in Congress that his State is powerless to compel the railways within its borders to extend to its citizens facilities by proper connection, switching, and the furnishing of cars to enable its people to have equal and fair treatment under similar conditions with other favored citizens, and that this condition comes from inability to enforce law in existence and to enact additional necssary legislation, and in effect appealing for relief to the Federal Government.

"There is no adequate remedy for this condition, except by the people of that State clothed with plenary power through the enforcement of the law, and the enactment of additional legislation, if necessary, to exercise the function of government."

C. L. BARTLETT,
GORDON RUSSELL.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 22, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN VAN SCHAICK, Jr., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. HALE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

LANDS AT MENA, ARK.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, there is a House bill on the table that I should be glad to have passed. I ask the Chair to lay it before the Senate.

The bill (H. R. 18529) to authorize the sale of certain lands to the city of Mena, in the county of Polk, in the State of Arkansas, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the city of Mena, in the county of Polk, in the State of Arkansas, at and for the sum of $2.50 per acre, the following-described lands, to wit: The fractional northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 6, township No. 2 south, range 30 west of the fifth principal meridian. And upon the payment of said sum the said Secretary is authorized to issue patent for said lands to said city.

Mr. BERRY. I will state that a precise copy of the bill has already passed the Senate, but a House bill was passed at the other end of the Capitol, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 19604) granting an increase of pension to Beverly McK. Lacey.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 15506) authorizing the patenting of certain lands to school district No. 57, Nez Perces County, Idaho; and

A bill (H. R. 17186) granting to the Territory of Oklahoma, for the use and benefit of the University Preparatory School of the Territory of Oklahoma, section 33, in township No. 26 north, of range No. 1 west of the Indian meridian, in Kay County, Okla.

JOHN E. PHELPS.

Mr. WARNER. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3535) to authorize the President to appoint John E. Phelps, late brigadier-general of volunteers, first lieutenant in the United States Army, and place him on the retired list, to report it favorably with amendments. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to the bill.

Mr. PILES. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, in line 5, to strike out the words "brigadier-general of volunteers" and insert "colonel Second Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers;" so as to read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, with the advice and consent of the Senate, John E. Phelps, late colonel Second Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, first lieutenant in the United States Army, and place him on the retired list with the rank and pay of a first lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, at the end of the bill, to change the period to a semicolon, and insert:

And the retired list is hereby increased by one for the said purpose: Provided, That no pay, allowances, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable to the said John E. Phelps for any period prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 6512) granting an increase of pension to Melende H. R. Smith; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CRANE introduced a bill (S. 6513) to promote the circulation of reading matter among the blind; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6514) granting an increase of pension to Alfred Augustus Stocker; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PERKINS introduced a bill (S. 6515) authorizing the President to appoint William Woolsey Johnson to be a professor of mathematics on the retired list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENT TO PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL.

Mr. NELSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the public buildings bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

SYMPATHY FOR HEBREWS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. McLAURIN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 68) expressing the sympathy of the people of the United States with the Hebrews on account of the massacres of members of their race in Russia, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the people of the United States are horrified by the report of the massacre of Hebrews in Russia on account of their race and religion, and that those bereaved thereby have the hearty sympathy of the people of this country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. KEAN. Let it be again read.

The Secretary again read the joint resolution.

Mr. LODGE. That is a pretty important resolution. I think it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the joint resolution goes over.

Mr. LODGE subsequently said: The joint resolution which was introduced and which I asked might go over I have examined, and it seems to me there is no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATISTICS RELATIVE TO LIVE STOCK.

Mr. WARREN submitted the following resolution, which was read:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor cause to be made by the Bureau of the Census, and to present the same to the Senate, a statement compiled from the most recent census returns, showing the number and value of cattle, sheep, horses, and swine in the United States; the number and value exported; the number and value imported; the number of persons employed in the slaughtering of live stock and the preparation of meat products and the amount of wages paid them; the amount of duty collected from imports of live stock for the most recent year for which such statistics have been collected.

Also a statement of the statistics of hides and leather tanned, curried, and finished; the number and value of boots and shoes manufactured in the United States; the number and value exported; the number and value imported; the number of persons employed in the manufacture of leather products, including boots and shoes, and the amount of wages paid them; the amount of duty collected from imports of leather products, including boots and shoes, and the value of hides and leather admitted free of duty, and the value of hides and leather admitted upon which duty is paid, and the amount of the same for the most recent year for which statistics have been collected.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that the resolution may lie upon the table, as I wish to submit some remarks upon it at a later date and before the close of the session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie on the table.

COMMERCIAL ORGANIZATIONS AND AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate a list of national, State, and local commercial organizations, also national, State, and local agricultural associations of the United States, to such extent as may be practicable, report to be made to the Senate during the month of December next, and that 1,500 copies be printed for the use of the Senate.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16953) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 13, 27, 28, 39, 40, 41, 49, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 76, 77, 79, and 80.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 66, 69, 74, 75, and 82; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert the word "seventy-two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "five hundred and fifty-four thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred and ninety-nine thousand one hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety-four" and insert the words "one hundred and forty-seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the Postmaster-General shall require all railroads carrying the mails under contract to comply with the terms of said contract as to time of arrival and departure of said mails, and it shall be his duty to impose and collect reasonable fines for delay when such delay is not caused by unavoidable accidents or conditions."

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And the Postmaster-General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and such postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 64: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "thirty-two thousand five hundred" and insert the words "thirty thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 65: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "seven hundred and ninety-three thousand six hundred" and insert the words "eight hundred and seventy thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 78: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out of the amendment "exclusive of holidays and Sundays," and substitute for the proviso the following: "That in the discretion of the Postmaster-General the pay of any rural carrier on a water route who furnishes his own power boat and is employed during the summer months may be fixed at an amount not exceeding seven hundred and twenty dollars in any one calendar year;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "That hereafter no article, package, or other matter, except postage stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, and internal-revenue stamps, shall be admitted to the mails under a penalty privilege, unless such article, package, or other matter, except postage stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, and internal-revenue stamps, would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "Committee" wherever it appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "Commission;" and add at the end of said amendment the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid out on the order of the chairman of the Joint Commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

BOIES PENROSE,
A. S. CLAY,
J. P. DOLLIVER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the report may lie upon the table until I can have an opportunity of calling it up after the pending appropriation bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be printed.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; let it be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be printed, and lie on the table.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move to take up the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, on page 102, after line 9, to insert a proviso relative to the traveling expenses of the President.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can not believe that the President of the United States will concur in this amendment proposed by the committee. Ever since the President has held his exalted position he more than any other man in the United States has promulgated the doctrine of equal rights to all and special privileges to none in the matter of transportation. The railroad rate bill which we have been considering for more than three months at the present session is the result of the persistent effort of the Executive of the United States for equal rights for the traveling public. Following his example and his strong inclination to remedy any wrong whereby any citizen should have any right that would be denied to any other citizen of the United States the Senate and House have passed an act which will undoubtedly become a law, which absolutely prevents any one of the Members of Congress or of the Executive Departments or the judiciary from accepting any special privileges from any transportation company. Now, this amendment seeks to make the author of this legislation an exception. I can not believe that the President who has so strenuously insisted upon equality of treatment will concur in a proposition that he himself is not to be considered as subject to the law which he has advocated for three years.

Those who propose this amendment seek to place it upon the ground that the President as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy is compelled to travel about the United States in the performance of his official duties. But, Mr. President, the law now provides for the payment of all the expenses of members of the Army or the Navy in their travels, and if in performing the functions of Commander of the Army or of the Navy the President travels from one place to another there is provision for paying his expenses.

This, Mr. President, does not pertain to a great fundamental doctrine that is established by the Constitution, that the Congress of the United States shall not increase the salary or compensation, nor shall the Congress or any State give any emolument to the Executive that has not been fixed prior to the time of his entry into that official position. It seems to me that this proposition can not be gainsaid.

In the nearly two hours in which I spoke yesterday I felt that I was speaking practically in the time of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN], who undoubtedly desires to go on now with the discussion, and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], for whom I requested yesterday a delay, is now present, and I hope he will have an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota for some reason appears to want to delay this matter. I trust that Senators who desire to debate it, who have the right to debate it, will bear in mind that it is very important that the pending bill shall be disposed of to-day as early as possible and sent to the House. I ask Senators who are discussing this matter and who are as much interested as I am in the business of the Senate to bear in mind the importance of getting the bill out of the Senate and over to the House and into conference.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can scarcely rest under the statement of the Senator from Maine that I evidently desire to delay the consideration of this bill. I stated yesterday to the Senator from Maine that nothing was farther from my mind than any intent to delay it. I also stated to him last evening that I would not speak more than ten minutes on the matter this morning. I have reduced that ten minutes to less than three minutes. That being the case, I do not feel that the Senator does either justice to himself or to me in assuming that I am attempting in the slightest degree to delay the consideration of this matter. I presume it will go to a vote in a very short time.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. President, I wish to say, so far as I am concerned, that I have taken up about as little time of the Senate in presenting my views before the Senate as any Senator on the floor. There have been frequently occasions when I have felt like presenting my views on matters, but I have refrained from doing so because I did not want to consume the time of the Senate.

I am as anxious to expedite the business of the Senate so that we may get an early adjournment as the Senator from Maine or any other Senator in the Chamber, and I would not now say anything further upon this amendment, but rest it upon what I have already said, except for the fact that it might appear I had complained of the allowance to the President of horses and carriages and the yacht which have been used, as I understand, by him, and by his family, for that matter. I make no complaint of that. The fact is that I do not think anyone makes any objection to it. I have not heard anyone make any objection to it. The objection I have made is to singling out the President and making an appropriation to pay his expenses and the expenses of his attendants and of his invited guests, the money to be expended and disbursed according to his discretion, upon any trip that he sees proper to take.

I make an objection to that, not so much on account of $25,000 involved in it, although I do not believe that it is in the rightful province of Congress to expend any money, however small the sum may be, except for the purposes of government, but I make the objection to it because there is a principle in it which draws a distinction between classes in this country. If you start, as I have said before, with the highest officer in the country and give him a preference and discrimination in his favor, after a while it will reach down to the lower offices and officers and on down, until there will be a class between the officers of the country and the private citizen and a discrimination made against private citizens. Against that I protest. Against the principle I protest. No man is required to associate with me who does not desire to do so. A man may select his own associates; but when it comes to the law, I have the same opportunity before the law that any other man has, and I want every other man to have the same opportunity before the law that I have. I therefore do not want any principle established that will make any discrimination or any distinction.

I want to read the syllabus here of a case on the constitutional feature of this amendment, and I shall have very little to say after that. The constitutional question was raised by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and I think very properly raised, and I think the constitutional proposition he makes is a correct one from a legal point of view. That is ridiculed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], who says that no matter can come up here unless somebody interposes an objection to its constitutionality and that its constitutionality must be questioned and investigated.

Now, will any Senator say candidly that any question ought to be passed by Congress about which there is any constitutional question that should not first be carefully scrutinized to see whether it measures up to the constitutional requirements, whether it squares with the Constitution or not? What Senator would say that the Constitution makes no difference? True it is that I have been sworn to obey the laws and Constitution of the country; true it is that my oath and obligation to my Maker, to my country, to my State, and to myself requires that I should investigate constitutional questions, because I am compelled by that obligation to square my official conduct and legislative enactments by the Constitution, yet any question of constitutionality must be turned out as being ridiculous in the eyes of some Senators.

In the case to which I referred the Senator from North Dakota yesterday, The Queen v. Postmaster-General (3 Queen's Bench Division, 428), a case that was appealed from the Queen's bench division to the court of appeals of England, it was held that traveling expenses are emoluments. This is one of the cases where I do not think it was necessary to have a judicial ascertainment of that question or a judicial decision of it, but inasmuch as Senators question it now, inasmuch as it is in the book, I propose to read it. It is on page 1205 of the tenth volume of the second edition of the American and English Encyclopedia of Law:

Traveling expenses.—The English telegraph act of 31 and 32 Victoria, chapter 110, enables the postmaster-general to purchase the undertakings of telegraph companies. By section 8, subsection 7, every officer and clerk of any company, the undertaking of which may be so purchased, who has been a certain time in the service of the company, and who is in receipt of a certain salary, is entitled, if he receive no offer of an appointment by the postmaster-general in the telegraphic department, to receive an annuity, which, under certain circumstances, shall be equal to two-thirds of the "annual emolument" derived by him from his office on a certain date. Under this act, S., an officer of a telegraph company that had been purchased, claimed as a part of his "annual emolument" the traveling expenses allowed him by the company, by reason of which he saved a large part of the money which he would otherwise have expended at home for board and lodging. It was held by the court of appeal, affirming the judgment of the Queen's bench division, that anything which S.'s allowance enabled him to save from his ordinary expenses was an emolument, and therefore a subject for compensation. Brett, L. J., said: "That annual emolument is the value of his appointment. If a person only receives a salary, what is the value of his appointment? If there is nothing to be added to the salary or deducted from it, the value of the appointment is the salary; but if the salary is subject to his finding certain materials, it would be impossible to say that the salary is the proper measure of the value of the appointment or of his emolument. The emolument would be the amount of the salary, less the cost of the materials he had to supply. Then, if he receives a salary and something additional by way of remuneration, the value of the appointment or of the emolument must be the salary and anything which he gains by the remuneration." Reg. v. Postmaster-General, 3 Q. B. D., 428. (American and English Encyclopedia of Law, vol. 10, p. 1205. Documents of Title to Emoluments.)

Now, if that is authority in this country, and I believe the English decisions have been held to be authority, as a rule, there can be no question that traveling expenses have been decided to be emoluments. Then, if they are emoluments, the Constitution is so plain that any effort to give these emoluments is unconstitutional.

Even the Senator from Maine says that the salary of the present President of the United States can not be increased—that is to say, it can not be increased by direct legislation; and this seems to me to be indirect legislation to do that which can not be directly done.

Now, I will read from the Federalist, on page 488, what Alexander Hamilton said with reference to the increase or decrease of the emoluments of the office of the President of the United States. I am indebted to my friend the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY] for this reference to the Federalist, which I take pleasure in acknowledging:

To the people of the State of New York:

The third ingredient toward constituting the vigor of the Executive authority is an adequate provision for its support. It is evident that without proper attention to this article, the separation of the executive from the legislative department would be merely nominal and nugatory. The legislature, with a discretionary power over the salary and emoluments of the Chief Magistrate, could render him as obsequious as their will, as they might think proper to make him. They might, in most cases, either reduce him by famine or tempt him by largesses to surrender at discretion his judgment to their inclinations. These expressions, taken in all the latitude of the terms, would no doubt convey more than is intended. There are men who could neither be distressed nor won into a sacrifice of their duty, but this stern virtue is the growth of few soils; and in the main it will be found that a power over a man's support is a power over his will. If it were necessary to confirm so plain a truth by facts, examples would not be wanting, even in this country, of the intimidation or seduction of the Executive by the terrors or allurements of the pecuniary arrangements of the legislative body.

And, then, by a note there is a reference to a case where the governor of the State of Pennsylvania was intimidated into doing that which he had promised before his election he would not do.

It is not easy, therefore, to commend too highly the judicious attention which has been paid to this subject in the proposed Constitution. It is there provided that "the President of the United States shall at stated times receive for his service a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States or any of them." It is impossible to imagine any provision which would have been more eligible than this. The legislature, on the appointment of a President, is once for all to declare what shall be the compensation for his services during the time for which he shall have been elected. This done, they will have no power to alter it, either by increase or diminution, till a new period of service by a new election commences. He can neither weaken his fortitude by operating upon his necessities nor corrupt his integrity by appealing to his avarice. Neither the Union nor any of its members will be at liberty to give, nor will he be at liberty to receive any other emolument than that which may have been determined by the first act. He can, of course, have no pecuniary inducement to renounce or desert the independence intended for him by the Constitution.

Mr. President, it was said on yesterday that the President of the United States ought to take newspaper correspondents along with him, that the people may know what he is doing; that the people desire to know this. I deny this proposition. A few curious people and people who have curiosity to gratify may like to read, and a good many toadies may like to read what the President is doing, what time of morning he got up, what time of evening he retired, what he ate for breakfast and for dinner and for supper, but the vast mass of the people regard the President as a human being. They do not care anything about the diet of the President or the drinking of the President, so he does not drink to intoxication, nor do they think about the President, except that he shall perform the duties that they elected him to perform.

But it has been said that the people desire that the President shall go among them and see them. Why, sir, if the President were to take up all his time in visiting among the people, not one out of one thousand would have an opportunity to see the President. If he performs the duties of the office confided to him and spends the balance of the time in traveling over the country that the people may have an opportunity to see him, as if he were some show, I doubt, sir, if one man in ten thousand people would have an opportunity to see him. I doubt, sir, whether a great many of the people would have more curiosity to see the President of the United States than they would to see Aguinaldo. The people of the United States elect a man not because they think he is better than anybody else, but because they want somebody and they are compelled to have somebody, according to the form of government that we have, to perform the duties of the office of the President of the United States. They have respect for him. They honor him. They honor the office. It is proper that the people should honor the President and honor the office. But when it comes to a curiosity to see him, they have no more curiosity to see him than any other man of note or distinction. As many men would have gone to see Gladstone as to have seen the President of the United States. It is on account of the great name that has gone out among the people in the newspapers and about whom the people have read, and it does not make any difference particularly whether he is the President of the United States or any other man of great distinction.

Mr. President, there are a great many more things I should like to say about this matter, but I am admonished by the Senator from Maine that we must cut this debate short, and I can understand his anxiety to get through with the bill that is in his charge. I desire to assist him in expediting it as much as I can, and therefore I propose to refrain from saying but a very few more words with reference to the amendment.

There is one question that I should like to have answered. Does the President desire this? Knowing him as I do, I do not believe that the President does desire it. I believe that if this question were put to the President of the United States alone he would veto a bill of this kind. I do not believe that the President, who has taught us to understand that there should be fair play and a square deal, would want anything else than a square deal with respect to himself. I know that the President, with all his intelligence and learning, must know that this would not be a square deal with all the rest of the people of the United States, unless he thinks that he should be put above them.

It is not any part of the duty of the President of the United States to mold public opinion. If that were so and he were to perform that duty, there would be never any change of political parties in the country, because when the President got in the office he would mold the opinion to suit his party and there would never be but one party. It may be that an opportunity of this kind might give him an opportunity to electioneer for the doctrines of the party to which he belonged; and then in the next term, when Mr. Bryan shall be President of the United States, it would give him an opportunity to do the same thing if he were disposed to do it.

But, Mr. President, it is the business of the President of the United States to execute and administer the will of the people as expressed by their public opinion. He is not expected to be the master who makes public opinion for them. He is to get public opinion from them—not they from him.

Why, sir, where they talk about and advocate and teach and hold to the doctrine of the divine right of kings the monarch gives public opinion to his subjects. He molds public opinion for them; he makes public opinion for them. They get their opinion from him. But in this country every man is a sovereign. The divine right of sovereignty comes to every American citizen equally with every other, and it does not make any difference what his walk in life be; he may eat his bread in the sweat of his face, he may make the money that furnishes him bread by mental effort, he may be a ditcher or a farmer or a merchant or a lawyer or a doctor or a laborer, or in any other condition in life—he is a sovereign, nevertheless, before the laws of this country, equal to every other man. He has a right to form his own opinion. It is not only his right to form and mold his own opinion, but it is his duty to do so; and he owes that duty to the country when he becomes one of the great electorate of this great country. He owes it to himself and to the country to mold an opinion for himself, to study questions of politics and policies and statecraft, so that he may have a voice in the government of the country, if not in a legislative body, or in an executive body, that he may have a voice through his representatives, whether they be executive, legislative, or judicial. It is not for the President to mold the public opinion of this country. It is the duty of the Executive (and if he attends to his duty it will take all his time) to administer the law in obedience to the public opinion that has been formed by all the people of this country by honest, earnest, assiduous study and effort. The wisdom of all the people is to be taken as superior to that of any man. The will of all the people should not be overridden by any one man.

I tell you, Mr. President, that I like a man who is a manly man. A man may be in humble circumstances, but I like that old saying of Robert Burns:

> A man's a man for a' that.

It has been an inspiration to many boys in humble position and in humble condition in this country.

> Give fools their dress and knaves their wine,
> A man's a man for a' that.

Under our form of government the humble boy of obscure origin can make himself a man. Sir, I have more admiration for the boy who ran through flood and flame to rescue his father some nights ago from at least supposed danger, the boy Wilber Coleman, whose name ought to go down in the records of the country—I have more respect for him and he is more of a man, when he is measured by the yardstick of Jehovah and not by the rule of precedence at a banquet, than the sordid individual whose selfish greed feeds upon nothing but money, though he may have accumulated an empire of commerce or peopled the ocean with his yachts. He is more of a man and is worth more to his country.

I say, Mr. President, that this amendment ought not to be adopted. The American people ought not to embark upon an emprise of this kind. Let every man dispossess himself and divest himself of Executive influence and walk up to this question and vote on it as an American citizen who does not desire to see American ideals sacrificed.

> What conscience dictates to be done,
> Or warns me not to do,
> This teach me more than hell to shun,
> That more than heaven pursue.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I did not rise promptly, because I had hoped that some other Senator would have something to say on this subject. I was necessarily absent from the session yesterday, and was not present at the beginning of the debate on this question and am consequently somewhat at a disadvantage in my ability to address what I shall say more directly to what has been already said, and possibly to avoid repetition of some things which have been said by other Senators. It is not my purpose to address the Senate at any length on this subject or to make any elaborate argument. I have glanced over the colloquy which was had yesterday between the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] relative to the subject of my desiring to be heard upon this amendment. The Senator from North Dakota drew his conclusion very properly as to my desire to be heard upon the bill from a private conversation with him, in which I expressed myself very emphatically in opposition to this amendment. While I may not realize the expectation which that Senator held forth that I should address the Senate at length upon it, I am very greatly obliged to him for considering it worth while to afford me an opportunity to enter my most earnest protest against this proposed legislation, and to give some few of the reasons why I think it should not be enacted.

In the first place, Mr. President, I am utterly at a loss, so far as I have any ability to judge of a legal proposition, to understand how any Senator, especially any Senator who is a lawyer, can claim that this proposition is constitutional. It is to my mind so plain that it is really beyond the domain of discussion further than a simple statement of the proposition. I presume that every Senator will recognize as a fundamental proposition that we have no right to appropriate money, except in obedience to some authority given to us to appropriate it. When we come to appropriate money for the President of the United States we must do so under authority given us by the Constitution. The authority under which we are to appropriate money for the benefit of the President of the United States is very explicitly given in the second article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Maine, because I have very great confidence in his judgment, and I want to address myself particularly to him. As he is the Senator in charge of this bill, I hope he may remove from my mind, if he can do so, the constitutional objections which I make to the adoption of this amendment. If it is not constitutional, Mr. President, of course neither the Senator from Maine nor any other Senator will recognize for a moment that we can for any consideration or under any influence adopt it.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. HALE. I think, as I said yesterday, Mr. President, that I can understand that Senators may have a doubt whether this in the last resort will be determined to be a constitutional provision or a provision justified by the Constitution. I have seen enough of the literature cited to believe that that is a doubtful question. Some Senators and some authorities set it clearly out that a provision of this kind is an emolument, and would be unconstitutional, while other authorities and other citations as given state just the reverse.

Now, every Senator must vote on this proposition as his judgment is with reference to this point. But the Senator from Georgia knows that in many cases legislation has been put into appropriation bills and has passed in distinct, separate measures, as to which Senators have had doubts, and it is finally settled by the court. Whether this proposition, if adopted, will get by the Comptroller of the Treasury, is a question; the committee having it in charge, seeing the necessity for it and not being clear that it was subject to constitutional objection, incorporated it in the bill as an amendment.

I shall vote for the proposition on the ground that I am willing that it shall take its chance with the Comptroller and finally with the courts. I am not certain about the point, I will say to the Senator. Some Senators are very certain, and I feel they will not vote for the amendment, while other Senators believe and cite authorities showing that it is not an emolument which is going to the President. But what I have stated is the attitude of the committee which has reported the amendment. I repeat, it will have to take its chance.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the learned Senator from Maine has done me the very great favor to answer my argument before I presented it. Nevertheless, I will take the liberty of presenting it, although I greatly regret that the Senator has announced, in advance of hearing it, that he will be not influenced by anything I say, and that he will vote for the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, nobody will present the constitutional argument as clearly and as attractively as the Senator from Georgia will undoubtedly present it; but still he will allow me to say that the point he is making is not in any way a new one; it has been already pretty fairly discussed and presented to the Senate, not as well as the Senator can do it, but so that we all have it in mind. Therefore I do not feel that my decision as to how I shall vote on this matter is in any way a reflection on the Senator. I have not heard him, but I have heard the propositions presented, and I have told the Senator what my views are about them.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have very great admiration for the Senator from Maine, and for nothing connected with the Senator from Maine have I greater admiration than for his mental capacity; but to the various reasons which I have had heretofore—good reasons—upon which to base that admiration I now have the additional reason of his power of prescience—his ability to know beforehand what one intends to say. I have not had an opportunity to present to the learned Senator the grounds upon which I base the suggestion that the constitutional point is so plain that I can not possibly see room for much argument upon it, and also the expression of the hope that the Senator from Maine, in charge of the bill, would take the point which I am going to present to him and remove the difficulties, because if we are to follow the lead of the Senator from Maine of course he ought to be able to show us, if we have difficulties interfering with our supporting the measure which he advocates, how those difficulties are not difficulties which should deter us, but difficulties which exist not in good foundation and which should be disregarded.

As I was about to say at the time the Senator interrupted me, the appropriation must rest upon some constitutional authority; and the appropriation for anything connected with money paid to the President of the United States, either directly or indirectly, must rest upon the clause of the Constiution which I have read, and which I will again read in order that I may make direct application of it, far removed as it is now by the colloquy which has been had between the Senator from Maine and myself. The sole clause in the Constitution which justifies any appropriation of money to be paid to the President of the United States, either directly or indirectly, is in these words:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Mr. President, here is a proposition to put $25,000 at the disposition of the President for his expenditure, absolutely within his own discretion, and subject to his own dictation and will. I would ask is that compensation? Senators will say, "No; it is not compensation." If it is compensation, it is undoubtedly unconstitutional to make that appropriation applicable to the President of the United States during his present term of office; and therefore, for the benefit of those supporting this amendment, we may exclude that, and say that it is not additional compensation. We concede that it is not additional compensation, or rather we concede that, if it is additional compensation, it is unconstitutional. Then what is it? Is it an emolument? Is it a perquisite? If so, it is also excluded.

Now, what I want, and I hope the Senator from Maine will give me his answer to it, if he can, and I hope I may have the attention of the Senator, because I desire the Senator's reply, if possible. If this is neither compensation nor——

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator repeat his question? I was called out of the Chamber, and I should like to hear it.

Mr. BACON. I am sorry that the Senator has asked me to repeat it, because on account of interruptions I have twice stated it; but I will try to do so again.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator need not mind.

Mr. BACON. My proposition is that if it is compensation it is unconstitutional. Senators will all admit that. If it is a perquisite or an emolument, it is none the less unconstitutional. I want to know, then, if it is neither a compensation nor a perquisite nor an emolument, what is it? How would Senators who favor this appropriation designate it, and under what head would they classify it when they make the appropriation?

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to answer?

Mr. BACON. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the money which is appropriated to pay the expenses of any officer of the Government—compensation?

Mr. BACON. For expenses?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; traveling expenses. Is it compensation or is it emolument?

Mr. BACON. No; that is a part of the expenses of the Government; but this appropriation does not profess to be for the payment of expenses.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what it says.

Mr. BACON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. It does not profess to be for his expenses. If it were, it would be limited to expenses, and there would be vouchers for it and an accounting, and it would be paid the same as in the case of other expenses.

Mr. SPOONER. It is for traveling expenses.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but this is an amount to be paid to the President of the United States, without regard to any accounting, and not limited to his personal expenses.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BACON. I will hear it with pleasure, because I am in very much trouble about this, and would like to have the explanation of this constitutional difficulty.

Mr. SPOONER. If the President expended $1,000 of this amount, leaving $24,000, would that $24,000 belong to him or to the Government?

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly the phraseology of the provision indicates that he shall have only so much of it as he expends.

Mr. SPOONER. Would a dollar of it go into his pocket as compensation?

Mr. BACON. Nobody would suggest that for a minute. That is absolutely without possibility of entertainment for a second. Nobody means to suggest anything of that kind.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator thinks the word "emolument," as used in this connection, does not mean some financial advantage to the President, the officer, whoever he may be?

Mr. BACON. Whatever "emolument" does or does not involve, the Senator will concede that this is not an emolument.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think it is an emolument.

Mr. BACON. That is what I say those who support this amendment must necessarily contend. Therefore, it is not necessary for us to discuss as to what is included in "emolument" and what is not, because all agree that if it is intended as emolument, it is an unconstitutional provision, and consequently it is not an emolument, according to the contention of those who favor this appropriation, and it is not a compensation according to those who favor the appropriation. They must contend that it is neither a compensation nor an emolument.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator agrees——

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a second. I will yield with pleasure in a moment. Then, I want to know, if it is neither an emolument nor a compensation, what it is?

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator, if it is neither compensation nor emolument, how does it violate the provision of the Constitution, to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. BACON. My proposition is that it must be one of the two. I will come to that. I base my argument upon that; that it is one of the two, and Senators all agree that, if it is either, it is unconstitutional——

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. BACON. Pardon me a second. Therefore, I say, contending as I do, that it is compensation or emolument, Senators must concede that, if it is either, it is unconstitutional. When they say it is neither compensation nor emolument, what is it?

Mr. SPOONER. Traveling expenses.

Mr. BACON. Well, Mr. President, I reply to that, in the first place, that it is not traveling expenses, because if it were traveling expenses, it would be the exact amount spent as expenses by the President, whereas this does not profess to be that. This is an amount to be paid at the discretion of the President and to be spent at his will, not only for his personal expenses, but for the expenses of such other people as he may choose to have share with him the benefit of this appropriation. It is an emolument; it is a perquisite; it is an additional amount of money given for his enjoyment, to be dispensed according as he may prefer that it shall be expended.

If it were the simple matter of the exact expenses of the President of the United States, it would have to be limited to the occasions when he was upon official business. But I would not draw any narrow line on that, because it might be said that the President of the United States whenever he is going about through the country is in a degree looking after public business, although it has frequently happened when a President has been an aspirant for election to a second term that he has "swung the circle" upon a purely personal political tour. This appropriation, however, does not profess to be strictly for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, and there is no provision under which there can be any distinction drawn in the expenditure of this money between that part of it which goes to the payment of the expenses of the President of the United States and the payment of those whom he may invite to accompany him.

I will ask Senators—and they can reply now or at any other time they see fit—if they understand that the payment of the traveling expenses of those whom the President may see fit to invite to go with him is a payment of part of the personal expenses of the President of the United States? Can any man possibly contend that it is so, and, if he does so contend, is there any man who can give a sound argument upon which to base such a contention?

I want to say further in that regard that the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred was framed in much wisdom. It had a double purpose in saying that the President's compensation should be neither increased nor diminished during the incumbency of a President of the United States. There was a design, in the first place, that the President of the United States should be put beyond and above the possibility of Congress being able to coerce him or constrain him in any way by having control of the amount of money which he should receive for his compensation. That was a great and a wise purpose. There was none the less a great and wise purpose, and as experience shows, in the growing power of the Executive, indeed a greater and wiser purpose, that he should not have the power, by reason of the influence of his office, to secure from Congress an increase of his salary during his incumbency, or that he should have the power by the exercise of such influence to secure from Congress any emolument in addition to his salary.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BACON. With much pleasure.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask my friend from Georgia how he can reconcile his action in voting for the item in the legislative appropriation bill for the support and care of carriages, horses, furniture, flowers, music, and other luxuries and comforts for the President and occupants of the White House and not call them emoluments, and say that this item for traveling expenses, which the President must pay out in traveling by reason of the action of Congress in not permitting him to travel upon a pass—how does the Senator differentiate between those two purposes?

Mr. BACON. It is perhaps as well that the honorable Senator has called my attention to that, and I will come to it before I conclude, not only as to the President, but as to some of these other gentlemen in the Executive Departments. As the Senator has so pointedly directed our attention to that subject, it is not to be evaded, and I propose to express my opinion on it without hesitation or qualification.

But, Mr. President, before reaching that I will pursue what I was saying, that this provision of the Constitution is one framed in much wisdom. In the first place, by the prohibition against the decreasing of the salary of the President there was thrown around the President this safeguard against any effort on the part of Congress to coerce or embarrass the Executive, and, in the second place, by providing that his compensation should not be increased it was designed to prevent the possibility that the Executive, with his great office and his great influence, should have the power or the opportunity to get from Congress an increase of salary beyond that fixed by law, or any emolument in addition thereto. Mr. President, if Senators will pardon me and not take it offensively, and no Senator take it personally, I think the very fact of this proposed appropriation and the probability that it will be made is an illustration of the wisdom of that provision of the Constitution. I think that Senators, without being conscious of it—not all of them, because I recognize the fact that there are differences of opinion as to the propriety of this provision which would control Senators outside of any influence—but I have not a doubt in the world that there are Senators who unconsciously are influenced in this matter by the fact that it is the desire of the Executive, and by their desire to conform in supporting it to what is generally understood to be the personal wish of the President.

But, Mr. President, I have a much graver reason for opposing this amendment than the unconstitutional feature of the proposed appropriation. Of course, if the feature of unconstitutionality related to the appropriation in the future as well as to this particular time, I could have no graver reason than that suggestion of unconstitutionality; but if this item is unconstitutional, it is unconstitutional simply as regards the next three years, and is not unconstitutional so far as it would relate to other subsequent incumbents of the Presidential office. So I repeat that the unconstitutionality of the proposed appropriation is a much less grave consideration, to my mind, limited as it would be to three years in its operation, than is the general policy which is involved in this matter and as it will affect future administrations.

If the salary fixed by law for the compensation of the President is insufficient we should change the law and make it sufficient. So long as we do not change the law and increase the salary we are practically saying that, in our judgment, the salary is sufficient. And when to a sufficient salary, as we pronounce it to be, we add an emolument of $25,000 a year, we are bestowing a favor upon him, we are exalting him after the manner of other countries, where classes and rank are recognized in the adulatory bestowal of favors and privileges upon them which are denied to others.

Mr. President, if the salary of the President of the United States is not sufficient there is no undue exaltation of the President of the United States in adding to his salary such an amount as will make it sufficient, and no one could be criticised for his desire so to do. But when you say that a certain amount of salary is sufficient for the President, and that is said in fixing his salary at a given amount, and when you segregate him and separate him, not only from all the people of the United States, but from all the officials in and of the United States, and set him up with an unlimited and unqualified power over an expenditure of money, not only for his own transportation, but for the transportation of such people as he may choose to surround himself with on his trips of business or pleasure, you unduly exalt the man who for the time holds the office of President. And when I say the man who for the time holds that office, I am not speaking of this time only, but of any future time as well. There is an exaltation of the officer; there is the setting apart of him; there is an approaching to those things which pertain to and peculiarly characterize royalty, which are inconsistent and inharmonious with the spirit of our laws and the genius of our Government; and for one I will not consent to it.

Mr. President, I am not in favor of exalting any man above his fellows, except so far as his merits may exalt him, or except so far as the dignity of the office in itself may exalt him. When you seek to surround that office with the trappings of royalty, and with the air and assumptions of royalty, and with the methods and practices of royalty, I make my protest against it.

It is not to the interest of those who are in these high offices that they should have around them these trappings, these emblems and privileges and recognitions of superiority, and these unusual favors. As I have had occasion to say before in this Senate, we are in a season of unrest, not only in America, but in other countries. That unrest may be unreasonable, and in many instances it is unreasonable, but in many others it is well founded; and in my humble judgment there is nothing that contributes so much to that unrest, there is nothing which dissatisfies and disturbs the people both in this country and in other countries to such an extent, as the visual evidence that they have in such matters of privilege and display, of the favoritism which throws around some men trappings and attributes of superiority and of power and of special privileges that are denied to other men. These things are irritating and disturbing to men in this country of equality of right and equality of privilege. I say, and I wish to press it home to Senators, that it is not to the interest of those in high places that the public should have their feelings in this regard and by such distinctions more and more irritated and ruffled and disturbed, and that they should have through such measures greater and greater cause for dissatisfaction and unrest. Everything that savors of royal distinction, everything that smacks of the special privilege of official rank and class, is justly distasteful to our people.

Mr. President, there are different ways in which the power exercised and wielded by high officials has been obtained; there are different sources from which it flows; and this country, above all others, is the one that stands out most distinctly where the source of power is from the people, in contradistinction to other countries, where the power had its origin with the ruler, where the liberties and privileges of the people are dispensations from those in authority that have been granted to the people by the rulers.

This Government was not formed for the purpose of exalting the official. We have no rulers, and the title is a gross misnomer, whether assumed by the official or conferred on him by others. In other countries the official or the ruler first had the power. He had the arbitrary power gathered first in small communities, and then assumed by one who took control of all the communities, and it was with the absolute power in his possession that little by little parts of that power were distributed to the people and enjoyed by them with its privileges as a matter of grace. But in this country the exact reverse of that was the method by which the officials became clothed with power. The power was all with the people. They formed the Government and created the offices and provided for the officials; and whatever of power and emoluments and whatever of attributes and of trappings the official has, came from the people by power given and privilege and advantages of all kinds which they enjoy given by the people to the official.

Senators can not too fully realize the fact that no office was ever created in this country for the benefit of giving power and dignity either to the office or to the man who should fill it. The office was created not to give honor and power to the officer who should fill it, but because the office was necessary to the people. Necessarily it carried power with it. I think the most dignified and powerful office in all the world is the office of the President of the United States, and it is not necessary for the President of the United States to go outside of his legitimate functions or to have bestowed upon him any of the favoritism and privileges and distinctions of a royal class in order that he may still be and remain the occupant of the most dignified and powerful office of all the earth. I would say no word in depreciation of it. On the contrary, within its legitimate functions I honor and magnify it.

It is not necessary in order that this office shall have its full need of dignity and power that we shall clothe it with any of those things with which those who wear crowns assume it their right to be clothed. The legislative department—that department in which is designed in the Constitution to be the principal department, the most influential department, the most powerful department; that which should be the most direct representative in the one branch of the people and in the other branch of the States, and that which should be clothed with almost all the powers, almost all the royal powers—is the branch which has control of these matters.

In this connection I must allude to the matter called to my attention by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS], that we sit here session after session and not only vote salaries to these officials of the Executive Departments in excess of those which we vote to ourselves, but that we give them carriages and horses and flowers and other things named by him. I did not know that flowers were provided for in the apropriation bill, but I take the word of the Senator from California to that effect. He is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say to the Senator from California that never since I have been in the Senate have I ever voted for any one of the particular things the Senator has mentioned, except in so far as I was compelled to vote for them after they were included in the appropriation bill in voting for the bill in general.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to say to my friend that during the thirteen years I have been here those items have been enumerated in the Book of Estimates made up and presented every year to your committee, and we have considered them.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly, I presume, that is true.

Mr. PERKINS. And I have never heard my friend the Senator from Georgia protest against them.

Mr. BACON. I think there has been something said in the past about executive officers having carriages and horses. I have the highest regard personally for the occupants of the executive offices, and a feeling warmer than regard for some of them. I have high regard for the President of the United States, and would utter no word of disrespect of him or them; and nothing that I say here is personal to him or to any other executive officer. Everything I say relates to these officers, past and future, as well as present. But I am unable to see why it is that we in making appropriations shall be giving carriages and horses to the heads of Departments. Do they need carriages and horses any more than Senators need them? Do they need them half as much? They sit in their offices and have people come to see them. We have to parade this whole town to attend to business, and yet who thinks of an appropriation for the purpose of giving carriages and horses to Senators?

Do not let me be misunderstood, Mr. President. I do not favor the giving of carriages and horses to Senators. But I say there is no reason why in the absence of the one there should be the other. The heads of Departments are the creatures of Congress. They are not the creatures of the Constitution.

We call them, by courtesy, "Cabinet officers," and we are glad to show them this merited courtesy. They are not known to the law as such. They are subject to our will. We can abolish every Cabinet office, every head of a Department, and substitute another for it whenever we see proper to do so. There is no expectation that we will do so, because the system has been framed in wisdom and is satisfactory. But I am simply calling attention to a fact in response to the suggestion of the Senator from California. I do not know that I would have mentioned it, out of delicacy, if he had not called my attention to it. But when he asks me pointedly how I reconcile the appropriation of money for flowers and carriages and horses, I answer him that I do not approve it, but that I condemn it. Whenever the Senator, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, will bring that question before the Senate and make an issue of it and give those of us in the minority an opportunity to be heard, he will find my vote cast in the negative. I repeat, whatever may be my personal feelings to these officials, I am not in favor of special privileges or undue exaltation for any official.

Mr. President, I was not here yesterday. I do not know what was done. But I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the rule. However, before I conclude what I have to say on the main merits of this question, I again call upon Senators who say this is neither a part of the compensation of the President nor a part of the emoluments to the President, in neither of which case would it be constitutional, to tell us what it is if it is not either additional compensation or an emolument or a perquisite. When they tell me it is a part of the expenses, I say, in the first place, that if it is a part of the personal expenses of the President of the United States it would be unconstitutional, because it would be a part necessarily either of the compensation or the emoluments.

Of course, if you make it a part of the expense of the Government in the payment of the railroad fare of the President of the United States, you might say that that was not either a perquisite or an increased compensation. When you put in his hands $25,000, to pay the expenses of himself $1,000, and $24,000 to pay the expenses of twenty-four others, I want Senators to tell me whether, when you give the President the power to invite twenty-four gentlemen to go with him and share his hospitality, the expense to be paid by the Treasury of the United States, it is not giving him an emolument; whether it is not a personal perquisite to him. Can it be other than an emolument when, because he is President, he is given $25,000 a year with which to entertain personal friends whom he may invite to accompany him on his tours?

But passing from that and concluding, I repeat I was not here yesterday, and I do not know what was said with regard to the point of order. But I wish to ask the attention of the Senator from Maine to Rule XVI, which I need not read over to him except so far as the specification of exceptions is concerned, with respect to amendments to an appropriation bill. I wish the Senator from Maine to tell me under which of these exceptions this particular appropriation falls:

> No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless—> it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law—

It is certainly not included in this—> or treaty stipulation—

It is not included in that—

> or act—

It is not included in that—> or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session—

It is not included in that—or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate——

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. One moment, if you please. It is not included in that.

Mr. HALE. Yes, it is.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me.

Mr. LODGE. That is exactly where it is included.

Mr. BACON (reading)— or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the Departments.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has passed the exception which makes it in order.

Mr. BACON. I understand; but I was entitled to read it through. Now, I will hear the Senator with much pleasure.

Mr. HALE. The amendment is in order, because it is moved by direction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BACON. Of course, the Senator's superior familiarity with such matters must go against mine, but I understand that to mean a committee outside of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. That has been ruled upon repeatedly.

Mr. LODGE. Over and over again.

Mr. HALE. An amendment may be offered by any committee of the Senate. If an amendment is put in the bill by direction of the Committee on Appropriations that is the action of a standing committee.

Mr. BACON. Very well, I will accept——

Mr. HALE. That has been ruled upon again and again.

Mr. BACON. As the Senator from Maine has so kindly given me the information I desired on that point, of course if he has the information on other points I have asked him about he will be equally kind and give it. Therefore, I hope when I have concluded the Senator from Maine will answer the constitutional question I have propounded: If it is not an increased compensation and if it is not an emolument or a perquisite, what is it? Of course I can not expect the Senator from Maine to answer the question when he did not listen to it while I was propounding it. But I will ask the Senator one other question.

Mr. HALE. I will ask other Senators, inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia is continually appealing to me, not to take my attention from the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator's request in that respect will be regarded. I was propounding a direct question to the Senator from Maine.

Now, I will take the liberty of asking the Senator from Maine another question, and that is upon what information does the Senator from Maine or the Committee on Appropriations, which he represents here, base the estimate of $25,000? Is it a guess or has the Senator information as to this being the particular amount; and if so, from whom was it obtained? I hope I may have that information from the Senator.

Mr. HALE. Like a great many other appropriations, it has never been figured with a lead pencil, by adding the different items, that it will amount to just this sum. The House put this proposition on after examination, and it was struck out on a point of order. When it came to the Committee on Appropriations here, the committee moved it and inserted it in the bill. It is believed that $25,000 is ample for this purpose.

Mr. BACON. Upon what does the Senator base that belief?

Mr. HALE. On the expenses of all these trips, the movements of the President, which he has a right to make and which the people want him to make. The committee believes that $25,000 will cover it. It may not. If it is not all spent, it will be returned to the Treasury.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, is it not true that that at last depends upon the number of men whom the President may see fit to invite to accompany him?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. The committee did not think it worth the while to say to the President that he could invite twelve men and could not invite the unfortunate number of thirteen. That is all there is in the provision about the President's discretion. The President never fingers this money.

Mr. BACON. There is no suggestion of that kind.

Mr. HALE. It is in his discretion, when he will take these trips, how many people he will invite. That is left, as it properly must be, to his descretion. The Senate can vote this proposition down, but nobody can with reason ask the committee to say it will be just $25,000 in one year. We can not say that, and do not pretend to.

Mr. BACON. Has the committee any information upon which to base this sum, or is it guided solely by a guess?

Mr. HALE. It is the judgment of the committee.

Mr. BACON. Without any information?

Mr. HALE. I would not say without any information.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will give us the information, in order that we may judge whether or not the appropriation is in proper proportion.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate thinks it too much, it can cut it down.

Mr. BACON. We can not do that unless the Senator gives us the information on which to base our judgment.

Mr. President, everyone recognizes the right——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to ask the Senator from Maine, while he is on the floor, whether or not there is a bill making this same provision on the Senate desk now, having passed the House?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. It passed the House after this discussion came up, but it has not become a law. The House of Representatives submitted this proposition, but that does not furnish the information of every sixpence that is going to be spent, for which the Senator from Georgia asks.

Mr. BACON. I do not ask for that. I am asking for some information——

Mr. FORAKER. I had an entirely different thought in my mind. It must be evident—if the Senator from Georgia will bear with me for a moment—that there is serious doubt in the minds of Senators—and many Senators—as to whether this is not an emolument within the meaning of the Constitution. I have that doubt. I do not know whether the President has any doubt about it or not. Lawyers may very well differ about the question, and I think it would be a great deal better—better for the President, for I am sure, if I know the man—and I think I do—he would not want us to unconstitutionally provide a dollar for his use in this or in any other way—I believe it would be a great deal better for us to pass a separate bill rather than to make this provision an item of the appropriation bill.

Mr. BACON. I think so, too.

Mr. FORAKER. If we make it an item in the appropriation bill, the President can not veto it. He can not take anybody's opinion about it before signing the bill. If, on the other hand, we pass the separate bill, the President, in view of the doubt about it, may take the opinion of the Attorney-General upon the subject, and we may have an authoritative determination of the question whether or not this is an emolument within the Constitution.

I am not speaking in my own time, but if I may be indulged further, I have been looking up this question a little in the very short time I have had at my disposal, and I find that, upon authority, this is certainly a very serious question. My own personal belief is that this would probably be held to be an emolument within the meaning of the Constitution, and unless I were entirely free from doubt on that subject I could not vote for the amendment; for I do not think any Senator has a right to vote for a measure which he believes is unconstitutional. I recognize that other Senators do not share that belief. I do not know whether the President has given this question any consideration. But now that the question has been raised, I am sure he would not want to expend this money unless he were sure that it was a constitutional provision of which he had a right to avail himself, and that we shall best serve him by passing a separate bill upon which he can take the advice of the Attorney-General.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says to me that the bill will never pass. The bill has already passed the House, and it may pass here. I do not believe there would be any serious discussion of the measure. Senators might want to register their dissent to the proposition by voting against it.

It is suggested to me that we have an agreement to vote on that measure. I do not know that we could reach such an agreement. I do not know how the Senator from Georgia would view it. He would, perhaps, in view of what he has said, be satisfied, if this item went out of the bill, to join in a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill which has passed the House be passed by the Senate. Then the responsibility would be devolved upon the proper officers of the Government to determine the constitutional question.

Mr. BACON. I would not interpose any factious opposition. Of course I would not agree myself to vote for it.

Mr. FORAKER. I understand that.

Mr. BACON. But I would not attempt to defeat it by delay. If the Senator from Ohio has concluded——

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say another word before I conclude. I wish to make a request for unanimous consent——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will wait until I conclude?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. I will not make it without the Senator's permission.

Mr. BACON. The Senator can make it as soon as I finish, which will be in five minutes.

Mr. President, I do not wish in anything I say to suggest that I consider that there is any impropriety in the President of the United States visiting different sections of the country. On the contrary, I think that upon occasions it is a very proper thing for the President of the United States to do. It is an example which was given by Washington himself. Washington, during his incumbency of the office, visited different parts of the country. He came to my own State, and within the past two days I have seen a memento of the visit which he made to Georgia, where he presented to the Chatham Artillery, a military organization which still exists in the city of Savannah, a couple of cannon which had been captured at Yorktown. Those are very highly treasured mementoes and the tradition of that visit is very highly treasured; and with that illustrious example, of course the suggestion of an impropriety is not in my mind at all.

But Washington paid his own expenses, and every other President of the United States from that day to this, who has traveled through the country, has paid his own expenses. There is not, in the case of the present incumbent or of any other probable incumbent, such a want of pecuniary means, either of his own or in his salary, as would debar him from the convenient payment of his expenses.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator from Georgia mean to say that when President Cleveland and President Harrison and President McKinley made journeys throughout the United States they paid for their trains?

Mr. BACON. I did not say so.

Mr. LODGE. I understood the Senator to say that precise thing.

Mr. BACON. I simply said they paid their expenses.

Mr. LODGE. It is well known they did not.

Mr. BACON. I said they paid their expenses, meaning by that that there were none paid by the Government. That is what I mean.

Mr. LODGE. They were paid by the railroads.

Mr. BACON. No; they were not paid by the railroads.

Mr. LODGE. The railroads furnished the trains for nothing, and have for years, to all Presidents.

Mr. BACON. The compensation to the railroads——

Mr. LODGE. The railroads will not carry the President in any other way, because the risk is too great.

Mr. BACON. After the passage of this bill they will not carry free the President or any other person.

Mr. LODGE. After the passage of this bill?

Mr. BACON. After the passage of the rate law, I mean, they will not carry the President or anybody else free.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. BACON. That is my view about that. I do not think the President any more than the humblest citizen of the United States ought to have his expenses paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LODGE. The humblest citizen is not obliged to pay for a special train.

Mr. BACON. I do not know that there is a necessity for the President to pay for a special train. But if there is, it is not such an absolutely exorbitant amount as to prevent his doing it. He may have a special car without any very great expense, and there is no reason why the President of the United States may not travel in a special car upon a regular train, and it would not involve any such expense as a special train. But this is not limited to the question of paying the expenses of the President. It is giving to the President this large emolument, a fund, with which he can gather around him his friends, and take them through the country at the expense of the Government of the United States. If that is not an emolument, I do not know how to class it.

An emolument is something of value given, something which attaches to the office, that is outside of the regular salary—some advantage, some benefit, something of good. Does any Senator pretend to say, when you say to the President of the United States that in addition to his salary he shall have the privilege and the opportunity, when he seeks to travel through the country, to gather around him his special friends and take them upon a train, and that he shall not be burdened with the expense of the entertainment of his friends, but that the Government of the United States will pay it, that that is no emolument, that that is no advantage? Is that no increased benefit or good attached to the office of the President of the United States? That is what an emolument is. It is some additional good, some additional benefit, some privilege, if you please, some additional advantage, not the salary of the office or the direct compensation of the office, but a good, a benefit, or an advantage which inures by reason of possession of the office. That is an emolument. You might as well say it would be no favor to a private individual or to a Senator if a like advantage were given to him, and that he would receive no additional benefit. But I will not pursue that.

I hope that some of the learned Senators, and especially the lawyers, will answer the question, If this is neither an emolument nor additional compensation, what is it; at least so far as it refers to the expenses of persons other than the President of the United States?

Now, Mr. President, I repeat, I do not wish to suggest any impropriety on the part of the President either of the present or any other time in visiting different sections remote and near; but when he does go, I do not wish, when the train passes through the country along by the toilers in the field and by the laborers in the workshop and at the desk and in the office and behind the counters, that they shall look upon a class of favored people, the guests of the President of the United States, traveling through the country at the expense of the Government of the United States, paid out of money contributed out of the fruit of their toil and their labor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the House bill upon this subject, which is upon the Secretary's table, may be taken up, and that without debate the Senate vote upon it.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will omit that part of his request about excluding debate, I will certainly agree to it.

Mr. HALE. Of course that is all there is in it.

Mr. LODGE. That is the only object.

Mr. HALE. It is the only object, because otherwise the debate will be transferred to that bill and would not close on this bill.

Mr. BACON. I would not expect to say another word, so far as I am concerned, but other Senators may want to debate it.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine what bill he refers to?

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. MORGAN. The bill the Senator refers to is not on the Calendar. What bill does the Senator refer to?

Mr. HALE. The bill which has come from the House of Representatives and is on the Secretary's desk.

Mr. MORGAN. Suppose it be reported, so that we can hear it read.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that it may be laid before the Senate, and that a vote be taken upon it without debate.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. HALE. Then I have another request that I wish to make.

Mr. BERRY. We do not know what the bill is. It has never been read.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Alabama has objected. Now, I have another proposition——

Mr. FORAKER. Let me suggest to the Senator from Maine that Senators are objecting because they do not know what the bill is. They tell me they do not know whether it is the same provision, and that is a reasonable ground on which to sustain an objection.

Mr. HALE. Unless some one objects to its being read, I ask that the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary, without objection, will read the bill.

The bill (H. R. 20321) to provide for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there may be expended, for or on account of the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, such sum as Congress may from time to time appropriate, not exceeding $25,000 per annum, such sum when appropriated to be expended in the discretion of the President and accounted for on his certificate solely.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes authorized by this act for the fiscal year 1907, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that that House bill be laid before the Senate, and that a vote be taken upon it without debate.

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. BACON. That a vote be taken now?

Mr. HALE. Now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HALE. If any Senator objects, that ends it.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator permit me to suggest that there will be no more debate on that bill than there will be on this provision in the pending bill, and I do not think there will be as much?

Mr. HALE. I must submit my request, and if the Senator objects, then——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. With all deference to the Senator, of course his object, under the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio, is to have a vote upon this separate bill rather than to have a vote on the amendment. There is not the slightest disposition or intention, so far as I can learn, on the part of anyone to factiously debate the bill or in a manner not consistent with due consideration and action on that bill, nor is there the slightest reason to suppose that there will be any extended debate upon it. There are Senators here who desire to be heard on the amendment if it should still remain before the Senate.

It seems to me that the Senator, looking to the practical accomplishment of a purpose, would be satisfied with the assurance given that there will be no factious opposition and no intentional delay.

Mr. HALE. I can not consent to set aside this most important appropriation bill, in which we are all interested and which will arrest adjournment, to take up a matter simply upon the statement that there will be no factious opposition to it. I have made the proposition. I do not ask Senators to agree to it.

Mr. BACON. Let me make another suggestion to the Senator. It is this, that the Senator ask unanimous consent that when the debate is concluded on this amendment a vote shall then be taken without debate on the bill.

Mr. HALE. If objection is made to my proposition, then I have another proposition, that all debate upon the pending amendment to the appropriation bill now under consideration and any amendment thereto shall close in one hour.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am trying to bring the Senate to a vote, but I can not consent that the appropriation bill shall be displaced and the House bill be brought up with no arrangement about the termination of debate upon it. Therefore I have proposed that all debate upon the pending amendment to the appropriation bill and amendments thereto shall cease in one hour from the present time.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator permit me to make another suggestion? It is that he make that proposition with reference to the House bill, that debate on that bill shall close in one hour.

Mr. HALE. Well, Mr. President, I will ask that the House bill be laid before the Senate, and that after an hour's debate the Senate shall vote upon it.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I do not see any necessity for urgency in the passage of this House bill. I do not believe it has been considered by any committee.

Mr. HALE. I am only proposing it to help us out of delay upon the appropriation bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. I am as utterly opposed to the bill that came in from the House as I am to this amendment. All the objections that I have to the amendment obtain equally to the House bill.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McLAURIN. If the position that I hold is correct—that is, the position that was first advanced by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that this legislation is unconstitutional—then that unconstitutionality will just as much apply to the bill that the House passed as it applies to this amendment. I do not think the Senator from Maine can expect the Senate to consider the House bill that has just been laid before the Senate——

Mr. HALE. All the Senator has to do is to object. Does he object to my proposition?

Mr. McLAURIN. I certainly do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. HALE. Now, of course, the debate is to go on.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I wish to say a word——

Mr. HALE. Let me finish the proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have tried to relieve the Senate from the delay upon this most important bill by two propositions, both of which have been objected to. I am powerless. I only say that the debate will proceed as Senators choose, and I shall ask the Senate to take a recess from 6 o'clock to 8, not with an agreement that no other matters shall be taken up, but I will expect a quorum of the Senate to be present, and I shall ask when we get into that session, if the Senate grants it, that every Senator shall be here. Otherwise this debate will run on the wide waters of Senatorial talk and it will not be got through for days. If I can, I am going to get this bill out of the way, so that we can adjourn next Thursday or Friday; but if I do not get it out of the way, I notify Senators that we will run into the heats of July. I shall do everything in my power to get it through, and I shall ask the Senate later to take a recess from 6 o'clock, so that we may have a genuine night session with every Senator present.

Mr. McLAURIN. I want to say that at the request of several Senators I withdraw the objection I made to the proposition of the Senator from Maine, but I do not withdraw my opposition to this amendment nor my opposition to the bill from the House. My opposition is as vigorous to the bill and to the amendment as it has been at any other time. I withdraw the objection. If any other Senator desires to make an objection, let him do it.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the House bill be laid before the Senate for consideration and that without debate, at 3 o'clock, a vote be taken upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, it has been my conviction of duty to object to all propositions that have been made about limiting debate upon a bill that has not yet been before a committee of the Senate. The rules of the Senate require that a bill coming over from the House shall be referred to a committee before it is considered by this body and reported upon. I want the Senators on the committee who have to deal with that bill to be responsible for it.

Mr. HALE. I was asking for what waives all rules, and that is unanimous consent. Of course, if the Senator objects that ends it.

Mr. MORGAN. I am stating the ground of my objection. I want a committee of the Senate to be responsible for that bill, with leave of the minority, if there is a minority, to make a report against it. The Senator says he wants to get this bill out of the way. Out of whose way does he want to get it?

Mr. HALE. Out of the Senator's way.

Mr. MORGAN. My way?

Mr. HALE. Of all Senators. Everybody wants to have this bill passed.

Mr. MORGAN. Not out of my way. I have never had a higher duty to perform in the world than to vote upon a sundry civil appropriation bill which carries $125,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Not quite as much as that.

Mr. MORGAN. How much is it?

Mr. HALE. About $100,000,000.

Mr. MORGAN. About $100,000,000. In considering a measure of that kind I am put to the top of my sphere, so far as my sense of duty is concerned, to try to see that the appropriations which are made out of the Treasury of the United States, which have to be collected out of the taxation of the people, should be understood, to say the least of it, and the heats of July are not distressing me any more than they have distressed me for nearly the last thirty years. I have sat even with the Senator from Maine until October and November passing upon measures.

Mr. HALE. So often that I got very tired of it.

Mr. MORGAN. That Senator may have retired; I do not know, but I still stood here at my post, and I am none the worse for it. No man ever wore himself out in the performance of an honest and a sincere duty. It is when they try to shirk it and try to get through that they get fragmentary, get broken up, get unhappy and uneasy, and run through their duty and are distressed.

Mr. HALE. I give way to the Senator. I withdraw my proposition,

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I want the floor.

Mr. President, entirely against my desire, wish, or expectation the coming over of this bill from the House under the peculiar circumstances that have attended its presentation here, this very remarkable proceeding in the Senate requires me, I think, to make some little running commentary upon this proposed legislation, which is entirely new, so far as I have heard, in the history of the United States.

It is peculiar. It is the only one of its kind. There is some emotion or commotion or pressure somewhere that forces this bill to the front, in spite of all the rules that we have adopted, and which puts it as the prime proposition before the Senate and the American people that we must pause and give our attention to it.

First of all, this bill originated in the House as a rider on the sundry civil appropriation bill. So far as I remember, it bore exactly the same language that it bears in the language of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate. A point of order was made against it in the House, and it was sustained. Exactly what that point of order is I have not had the opportunity to ascertain. Whether it was the constitutional question which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] so forcibly presented on yesterday, or whether it was because there was no estimate for it, or whether it was because it was new legislation of a general character upon an appropriation bill, I do not know.

Mr. GALLINGER. The latter was the point.

Mr. MORGAN. New legislation?

Mr. GALLINGER. New legislation.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good. If the legislation was new in the House it is new in the Senate, and we have a rule that prohibits us from putting new legislation on an appropriation bill of any kind. Why does not that rule stand against this bill? Why should we be compelled day after day to debate a question when our rules condemn it, and when the House has enforced the very same rule to condemn it as a proposition of parliamentary law?

Now, there is some pressure about it. Where does it come from? There is no estimate here, we are told. There is no recommendation from the President or from any head of a Department. Then it is a proposition that must originate in one body or the other, among the members of that body or this, on the suggestion of some Member of the House or some member of the Senate.

There is, Mr. President, no pressing public necessity for the existence of this law. The President has not made the excursions or the circuits around the country that are proposed to be paid for in this bill. If it was to compensate the President for losses that he has heretofore sustained or expenditure he has made, or been compelled to make in consequence of his personal popularity, or in consequence of his distinction, of his high office, and the desire of the people to see him, I would not oppose the remuneration of the President after he had expended the money. But we are looking ahead now. We are looking to excursions that are to be made, to trips that are to be performed. What are they? Well, I do not wish to be unkind about anything, but to my mind it is suggested naturally that there will be a great hunt gotten up in the United States, to be conducted in the mountains and on the prairies of the West, and that the scions of royal blood from Europe would be invited over here as guests to see the performance that American sportsmen should engage in and their wonderful success in competition with the emperors and kings of Europe.

I noticed the other day that a shipment had been made from Germany to Spain of certain trophies which had been captured by the King of Spain when he was a visitor to William, amounting to a large number, that were sent for the purpose of complimenting him on the occasion of his wedding.

Well, Mr. President, among the expeditions and travel around the circuit that may take place during the coming summer or winter or next summer—for this $25,000 appropriation is limited to a year, I believe—what are we to have? What are we to expect? What do we know about that? Some gentlemen have been unkind enough to suppose or to suggest that perhaps it is intended for political expeditions. If the President of the United States wanted to get up a company of spellbinders, pay their expenses and their compensation, if necessary, in going around to enlighten the people of the United States upon matters that they know a great deal better than the spellbinders know, as a rule, I think the money would be thrown away in such an expedition as that. But that is entirely within the reach of the appropriation. So is the great hunt, which would be attended, no doubt, by retainers in velveteens red or black or blue, in caps red, black, or white, feathered or otherwise, made to fashion, trophies and fanfaronade of this kind that would lead the great procession out, with the President of the United States at the head of it, and the man appointed to office after his last hunt because he could catch a live wolf and choke him to death with his hands would be there to perform again. He would have that performance going on here, I suppose. At all events it is within the purview of the bill.

There is no great public necessity for that that I can see. The people of the United States have not been educated by object lessons of that kind heretofore, and I do not think the necessity is just now arising for such a kindergarten performance as that in the way of hunting expeditions.

Now, Mr. President, I am treating this subject seriously. I do not say that the President of the United States would take the money of the people, take the labor of 25,000 men one day to earn this money, to be thrown away in an expenditure for journeys and trips that are not necessary for the public welfare.

Why, the President's family is not provided for in this bill. He could not take his wife and children with him. They must be his invited guests, and they could not go along unless he wrote them an invitation to go with him and made them his guests in that way.

Evidently it is not for the purpose of assisting the President in meeting those social duties which are so happily performed by him and have been by all our other Presidents. There is some movement in it outside of the performance of mere social duty. It is either political or else it is a hippodrome that we are providing for—one of the two. It is a hunt or it is a political excursion of some kind. Otherwise the people of the United States could not possibly have any personal interest in it, not to say a national interest in such a performance.

Why was this bill passed through the House after it was ruled out on a question of order? Well, the House saw good reason, no doubt, for passing this bill and appropriating $25,000 for the present fiscal year to provide for such expenditures as the President may choose to incur—not such as he has been obliged to incur or will be obliged to incur, but such as he may choose to incur.

Then the bill comes over from the House, handed in here by the proper officer of the House as having been passed by that body, and is not reported to the Senate, even as is the appropriation bill under examination. It is withheld, and it is only upon the call of a Senator that the provisions of this bill have been made known to the Senate at all. I suppose I will be criticised severely as a sort of barbarian because I insist that under the rules of the Senate that bill shall go to a committee and some committee shall be responsible for reporting it here affirmatively or negatively.

Now, Mr. President, the heat of July does not frighten me into such an abuse as that of the rules of the Senate and of all propriety. This bill would not be popping up on every occasion and in every imaginable form unless there was some pressure behind it that Senators feel is irresistible. Yet nobody avows it. Not a man in this Government has made an estimate for it. The President has not made an estimate for it. The President has not intimated, so far as I know, to any person in the Senate or in the House that he thinks it is necessary for the public good or for his personal advantage or protection that we should vote him $25,000 a year as an emolument in addition to his fixed compensation.

Mr. President, I wish to say a word upon that subject. Both the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] have handled it with remarkable power and skill, and they have produced conviction upon my mind that I think nothing in the world could remove. But the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] yesterday seemed to have some difficulty about what was included within the word "emolument." I take up the Constitution of the United States and read it from end to end and treat it as a progressive work, a work in which stone by stone the great temple was built. In examining each of these I find its relation to the other, to the binding stuff that holds the temple together and to the finish put on it by the architect.

In reading this Constitution, I come across first this provision, on page 197 of the Constitution as printed in the Manual of the Senate:

> No title of nobility shall be granted by the United States; and no person holding any office of profit or trust under them shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state.

The framers of the Constitution first took in the kings and princes or foreign states, and excluded them from the opportunity of granting presents, emoluments, office, or title of any kind whatever, to any person holding office under the United States. They disposed of that subject conclusively, and they used several words for the purpose of indicating what they meant by what they were saying in this Constitution. They used the word "present," to "accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever." They intended to exclude the officeholders of the United States from any participation in the favors and compliments and honors and titles that foreign governments might bestow upon them.

After they had gotten through with that branch of the subject, they came to the President of the United States, and they became a little more stringent in their provisions. Having already included presents, offices, and titles of any kind whatever, in respect of those who might accept them from foreign countries, they came to the President of the United States.

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation—

Compensation. That means full payment. There can not be compensation in respect of any debt or duty that is not a full payment. He shall receive—

> A compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Compensation covered the whole of the legislation in regard to the President, so far as Congress is concerned. Congress can not add to his compensation and he can not receive it from Congress. It would not be going too far to say that if Congress should vote $25,000 additional compensation to the President of the United States, and the bill should become a law by his signature, Congress would patently violate the Constitution in adding to his compensation, and the President would be liable to impeachment for a high misdemeanor if he should receive it. The Constitution intended to shut off everything from the President but compensation.

Now, what is compensation? It is that allowance which is made by law for the payment of an officer for the duties that he performs. Whether you call it "salary," or whether you call it "emolument," or whatever you call it, it must still be and is compensation and nothing but compensation. So that the President can not receive an addition to his compensation by the consent of Congress as these other officers may receive titles, emoluments, presents, and gifts from foreign countries with the consent of Congress. Congress must give its consent before they can receive them at all.

Suppose I should propose to put upon this bill a proposition to reward some of our great soldiers or our great scientists by conferring upon them some of those many insignia of proper reward that have been conferred upon them by foreign potentates? Why, Mr. President, the table of the Committee on Foreign Relations almost groans with bills now offered in this body for the purpose of enabling our distinguished and notable people to receive these honors and emoluments and insignia, etc., of the good will and pleasure of foreign countries. Suppose I should go into that committee room and pick up one of those bills and bring it into the Senate and ask, in consideration of the great services performed by the party in question, that the Congress of the United States should put a privilege upon that bill for that man to receive that reward, there is not a Senator on this floor who would not object on the ground that it was out of order, that it was not germane to the subject, that it would be new legislation, that it had not been called for by any estimate, and that no officer of this Government had passed it in review. So it would go out of the bill instantly.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a minute——

Mr. MORGAN. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to insist that during the consideration of this bill there should be a quorum present. There is not now a quorum present, and, in view of the absence of the Senator from Maine, I make the suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WARNER in the chair). The Senator from Georgia having suggested the absence of a quorum, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allee	Clay	Heyburn	Patterson
Ankeny	Crane	Kean	Penrose
Bacon	Daniel	Kittredge	Perkins
Bailey	Dick	La Follette	Piles
Benson	Dillingham	Latimer	Proctor
Berry	Dolliver	Lodge	Scott
Beveridge	Elkins	Long	Simmons
Blackburn	Flint	McCreary	Smoot
Brandegee	Foraker	McCumber	Spooner
Bulkeley	Frazier	McEnery	Stone
Burkett	Fulton	McLaurin	Sutherland
Burnham	Gallinger	Mallory	Tallaferro
Burrows	Gamble	Martin	Warner
Carmack	Hale	Morgan	Warren
Carter	Hansbrough	Nelson	Wetmore
Clapp	Hemenway	Overman	Whyte

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I should like to say, in the absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who was in the Chamber a moment since—he has the matter in charge, and of course I suppose he will be here to maintain his own proposition—I should like to say that if the Senator from Maine was willing to take the responsibility of asking the Senate by unanimous consent to lay aside its rule and take up the bill that has come over from the other House, consider it without reference to a committee, and without having the responsibility of a committee interposed between the Senators who oppose the bill and Senators who vote for it, I will not make that objection. He can go ahead and take the responsibility, but I want to shoulder the responsibility of this upon somebody who is willing to take it. I do not want to shoulder it upon the Committee on Appropriations, who have presented this amendment here in the form in which it stands. We do not know and the country does not know who to call in question for this amendment proposed on an appropriation bill. Who is the author of it? Who brought it forward? Who takes the responsibility of trying to defend the proposition that this bill is within the rules of this Senate, when it is amenable to three objections, one of which was stated yesterday with the clearness of light by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]—the constitutional question—and the other two that it is new legislation and that it has not been estimated for? It is traveling through the Senate, and it appears to have traveled through the other House, without anybody being willing to stand godfather for it. Let us know who is sponsor for it. Because some Senator has not espoused and avowed this as his proposition, the world will say that the President of the United States has been doing it, and doing it secretly and in an underhanded way. That is what they will say about it. I do not want to see the onus of this matter upon the President. Let some Senator take it or some committee take it, and let us answer to the American people as men ought to answer for their conduct on this floor.

I do not like the way in which this bill was originated. I do not like the way it has been handled in the other House, where it was first voted off an appropriation bill on a question of order and then pressed through the House and sent here, and when it got here it was not laid before the Senate, but was detained, in the hope that the vote would be taken on this amendment before we knew, officially at least, that the House had acted on the bill.

Now it appears here, and propositions are based upon it, propositions to take it up and act upon it without debate. Of course I would not consent to that, not that I want to speak upon it, but I do not propose to be one consenting to the absolute destruction of the privileges of the Senate to debate within the boundaries of reason any question that comes here. We are asked to pass upon it without debate, and that because it is expected July will be a hot month. It may be colder than June for aught we know.

Mr. President, I was discussing the proposition to show how this measure had passed through the minds of the men who framed the Constitution of the United States, and how they first took up all the officers holding offices of trust or profit under the United States and forbade them from receiving any presents, gifts, honors, titles, or emoluments of any kind whatsoever, says the Constitution, from any foreign potentate or prince or power. Did we suspect that the men who were going to enter into the service of the Government these men were then forming would be misled or influenced improperly by gifts and honors and titles of nobility, and such as that, conferred upon them by foreign people? We then, Mr. President, had very good reason for being very jealous of the power of the British Government and the British people and the British nobility over the people of the United States. There was then a large body of people in this country who were called "Tories," who were the friends of the British Crown and who adhered to it. Many of them fought us in the war of the Revolution and others escaped by going to Canada. After the war was over there was a great collection of those people in Canada. They were high-blooded people, educated people, people of strong convictions, and they preferred the British Government to the new proposition or enterprise that was entered upon, under the leadership of General Washington, by the Army and by the associated or confederated States. They preferred the British Government.

When we came to form a government, our fathers said no man who holds office of trust or profit under the Government of the United States shall ever receive from any foreign prince, power, potentate, or ruler—I do not quote the exact words—any office or emolument or gift or title of any kind whatsoever without the consent of Congress.

In the process of their reasoning they went further, and they found a man who should fill the Presidency of the United States possibly still more amenable to the weakness of human nature, of false pride, and of temptation that might be held out to him by foreign governments, or by even the States, or by the party that he might head in the Government. Thereupon they put an absolute restriction in the Constitution, so that Congress could not relieve against it and Congress could not permit him to receive anything but compensation—compensation for what he engaged to serve the Government for at the time he entered on the office, which should not be changed—either increased or diminished—during his term of office.

They went still further, and they provided as to the compensation of the President that it—shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

They cut the States out; so that Congress could not permit him to receive, for instance, from the great Empire State of

New York, of which he is a native citizen, some great emolument, some great benefit. Suppose the State of New York should vote him a great palace during the time that his Presidency continues, to be occupied by him officially, whereby the summer capital of the United States would be transferred to New York City. The Congress of the United States would never permit him to enter it, because it had not consented and could not consent to his receiving any such emolument as that from the government of his own State of New York.

Already, Mr. President, we have two capitals in this country; but we are not making any objection about that. One is at Oyster Bay in the summer, and the other is Washington in the winter and during the sessions of Congress. While there is great inconvenience, and perhaps sometimes extreme difficulty in conducting properly the affairs of the Government because the President finds it necessary for the health and comfort of his family to reside at an old homestead at Oyster Bay, where he goes and transacts the public business, nobody complains and nobody challenges his right to do it at all. But still Oyster Bay is the summer capital of the United States unquestionably.

That is as far as we can go. If the Congress of the United States should pass a law for the delectation or for the convenience or for the comfort of the President, that the capital of the United States should be at Washington in the winter and Oyster Bay in the summer, that law would be unconstitutional, because you say that it is for the accommodation of the President and that the emoluments of his office do not reach the proposition that he could go there and establish himself for the summer.

We are traveling upon dangerous ground here, and we are doing it without any necessity. If it could be pointed out that there was any necessity for it; that the Government would in any sense be bettered by it; that it would be anything more than a gratification to the President and his invited friends or to the people who might wish to look upon the pageant that would pass through the country, paid for by an appropriation of Congress—if it were anything more than that; if there were anything in it connected with the Government or its administration in any form whatever, there might be some excuse for the enactment of this provision. But there is none; it is a pure donation for excursion purposes; that is all; there is nothing else to it. It is an appropriation for excursions hereafter to be undertaken and conducted by the President and his invited friends. We can not say that the President should invite all his friends, or that he should invite any of his enemies, if he has any, or that he should invite all the spellbinders of a certain political party and keep the others out, or that he should attend conventions in certain doubtful States and need not attend them anywhere else. It is proposed to give him the discretion to go where he pleases, to spend as much money as he pleases in these outings, provided he limits himself to the invitation of such guests as he may find agreeable. That, Mr. President, has less to do with the future destiny and the conduct of the Government of the United States than anything I can think of connected with one of the great offices of this country.

Suppose we should extend this privilege to the overworked and overtaxed judges of the Supreme Court of the United States; suppose we should provide that they should have $25,000 apiece for going off and recreating themselves and should have the privilege of taking their friends with them when they went. Are they not as much entitled to it as the President? Do they not work as hard as he does? Have they not as much responsibility to God and the people as he has? Do they not take the acts and laws that he may have approved and pass on them and sometimess declare them void and of no avail and of no effect? They stand above him in power when we come to weigh the matter correctly. They do more work than he does. Any one of the nine does more work than the President of the United States. They labor in silence and in quietude and in retirement where their physical energies are drawn upon to the extent of prostration many times. Many of those noble men have gone to early graves simply because they killed themselves working for the people of the Untied States. If they had had this $25,000 a year to go out with their friends, and banquet and attend those great hunts or go to the watering places, it would be very natural to suppose that many of them would be living yet.

When we break over this line, when we commence authorizing the President of the United States, who is absolutely forbidden to receive such gifts or donations or rewards or emoluments, or whatever you please to call them—whenever we transgress this line, then, Mr. President, we will have the States coming here with invitations to the President of the United States saying, "Congress pays your expenses; come to us; we need you; we want you; come to us, enlighten our people; bring your spellbinders along, and in the next Congressional election in November we will roll up a handsome majority for you and your party, or in the next Presidential election we will give you a third term. Come to us." Would anybody expect me as a member of the Senate to offer a bill that the next President of the United States after the present incumbent, if he should be a Democrat, should have his expenses paid at the rate of $25,000 a year to visit Alabama and gratify our people there? Would there be any necessity for that or any propriety in it? Would it not disgust the Senate if I should offer such a proposition as that? And yet it is quite as legitimate as the proposition that is offered here to-day. To my mind, Mr. President, it is all so perfectly plain upon constitutional grounds, upon grounds of public policy, and upon the action that has been taken in regard to this very bill, which seems to have been furtive, at least, in both Houses, satisfies me that it is my duty to vote against the amendment.

Mr. HALE. Now, Mr. President, to see if we can make some progress, I renew my request for unanimous consent that the House bill be laid before the Senate, and that at 4 o'clock, without further debate, a vote be taken upon it. If it carries, Mr. President, I shall on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations withdraw the amendment now pending and we will be able to proceed with other matters. I will say that I do this because it has been suggested to me that in my absence the Senator from Alabama indicated that he would withdraw his opposition to the proposition.

Mr. MORGAN. I will be willing to withdraw my opposition to the proposition, but I want the Senator from Maine to withdraw something, too. I want him to withdraw this amendment.

Mr. HALE. I have stated that at the moment the bill is disposed of I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. But why not withdraw it now?

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw it now.

Mr. MORGAN. If we are going to vote upon the bill as a proposition of new law, why not say that the amendment is not proper here? If the amendment is withdrawn, I will consent that we take up the original bill.

Mr. HALE. I see the force of the Senator's proposition. I will withdraw the amendment now.

Mr. MORGAN. Very good; if you will do that, I will consent to do almost anything you want to do.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. McLAURIN. Is that amendment withdrawn without reference to whether or not there is consent to take up the other bill? I know the amendment is withdrawn now.

Mr. HALE. Of course if consent is not given to the other proposition to which the Senator from Alabama has agreed, I shall have to renew the amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then it is a withdrawal with a string to it.

Mr. HALE. But I trust to the good sense of the Senate with reference to that. I do not think anybody believes that we will gain anything by the prolongation of this debate. Nobody can suggest anything new about it; and I think we all want to pass this bill and send it over to the House. I am willing to leave that to the good sense of the Senate. I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to say, so far as all of us wanting to pass this bill is concerned, that I for one do not want to pass it, and I will vote against it. I understand the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. The amendment is withdrawn. Now, Mr. President, I make my proposition——

Mr. MORGAN. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine in regard to the amendment I suggested to him to-day. If that goes in, I do not know of any objection.

Mr. HALE. I shall return, then, to the bill, and it will be open to any amendment after that. I shall ask that the bill be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine complete his request?

Mr. MORGAN. Then I understand, if I gather it correctly—I do not hear very well—that the Senator from Maine withdraws this amendment?

Mr. HALE. I withdraw the amendment and I make the proposition that, in its stead, the House bill on the same subject be laid before the Senate for its consideration, and that at 4 o'clock, without further debate, a vote be taken upon it.

Mr. MORGAN. That is to say, that after the Senator has withdrawn the pending amendment the appropriation bill shall be temporarily laid aside and the House bill taken up?

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. Debate to close upon it at 4 o'clock?

Mr. HALE. The bill will be open to amendment afterwards.

Mr. MORGAN. Debate to close at 4 o'clock?

Mr. HALE. Yes; undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McLAURIN. Let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Maine. The amendment is withdrawn, and I believe there is only one other amendment to the sundry civil bill. It will take very little time, I think, to dispose of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Two.

Mr. McLAURIN. Two amendments. They will take very little time.

Mr. HALE. Very little time. There are no controversies.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why not go on with the sundry civil bill and dispose of it, and let the Senator's request be that we vote upon the other bill immediately after the disposition of this bill? I want to look at the other bill a little while. I do not desire—at least, I do not think I will desire—to say anything. If the Senator asks that there shall be no debate on it, I will consent to that. But I would prefer to have an opportunity to read the bill. I have never seen it. I heard it read. I do not suppose it has been printed. If it has been printed and laid on the desks of Senators, I have not seen it. I should like to examine it a little while, at least. I may want to offer some amendments to it.

Mr. HALE. Then, we will proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the understanding?

Mr. McLAURIN. What objection can there be to that course?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine requests that the House bill be now laid before the Senate, and that at 4 o'clock the Senate proceed to vote upon the bill without further debate. Is there objection?

Mr. MALLORY. I object.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why not go on with the sundry civil bill, with the amendment withdrawn, and then, by unanimous consent, vote on the other bill as soon as this bill shall have been disposed of? Can there be any objection to that course? It would give Senators an opportunity to examine the House bill. Surely there can not be any disposition to have it rushed through and to have a vote upon it without an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senators who are opposed to it have had an opportunity to present their observations quite fully, and no one who wishes to reply will have any opportunity whatever.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is the proposition of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care to take any time.

Mr. McLAURIN. It is the proposition of the Senator from Maine to do that. I do not desire to cut off debate.

Mr. SPOONER. The proposition of the Senator from Maine is to take up the bill now, laying aside the sundry civil bill, as I understand, to discuss it until 4 o'clock, and then to vote on it.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. McLAURIN. That would give an hour and a quarter. Then suppose you give an hour and a quarter for debate at the termination of the consideration of the bill we now have before the Senate. What would be the difference?

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all right.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine kindly restate his request?

Mr. MORGAN. Is the amendment withdrawn?

Mr. HALE. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. CARMACK. Do I understand that the amendment is withdrawn?

Mr. HALE. The amendment is withdrawn, and we are to proceed with the House bill until 4 o'clock, when a vote will be taken, and after that I shall insist that the appropriation bill be brought to a final vote, with one hour and a half more for debate if Senators want it.

Mr. McLAURIN. That is not my proposition. My proposition was to take up the House bill at the conclusion of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MARTIN. The sundry civil bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator from Wisconsin objected, because, he said, it would give no opportunity to Senators in favor of the proposition to be heard. If the proposition made by the Senator from Maine were accepted, it would give only one hour and a quarter to Senators who want to speak on the bill. I say give an hour and a quarter for that purpose after the disposition of the sundry civil bill.

Mr. HALE. Very well. I ask, then, that all debate on the sundry civil bill shall cease at 4 o'clock, and then I will ask the Senate to take up the House bill and vote upon it at half past 5, or not later than half past 5.

Mr. McLAURIN. What is the objection of the Senator to finishing the bill we have before us—the appropriation bill?

Mr. HALE. I am afraid I can not finish it. That is the trouble.

Mr. McLAURIN. It can be finished just afterwards. If, by unanimous consent, the Senate can immediately take it up and limit debate to a particular time——

Mr. HALE. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

Mr. McLAURIN. Why would not that proposition be better? It would certainly give an opportunity to Senators to examine the House bill, which we have not had a chance to do; at least I have not.

Mr. HALE. Is there any objection to my proposition, that debate upon the pending appropriation bill shall cease at 4 o'clock? Then—not that the bill is disposed of—I will ask the Senate to take up the House bill, and at half past 5, another hour and a half, a vote be taken upon it, and after that I shall ask the Senate to pass this bill. There is no reason why it could not be passed then.

Mr. McLAURIN. The Senator does not seem to understand that nobody has had an opportunity to consider or examine the House bill.

Mr. HALE. It will give two hours and a half to that very purpose. I am giving an hour and a half of debate on the bill generally. Then take up the House bill and have another hour and a half on it.

Mr. McLAURIN. The House bill has not been printed.

Mr. HALE. It has been printed and read.

Mr. McLAURIN. I know it has been read. I heard it read. But I have not seen it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can examine it under my proposition. Otherwise, unless I can have that consent, the debate must proceed, and I shall ask the Senate to come here to-night and settle the whole matter.

Mr. McLAURIN. All right.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered an amendment——

Mr. SPOONER. Is that agreed to?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered an amendment on page 176——

Mr. McLAURIN. I did not object to it.

Mr. HALE. I understood——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine kindly restate his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. McLAURIN. I will state that I was merely trying to get an agreement which would be satisfactory to all of us, but if the Senator from Maine will not accept anything of that kind——

Mr. PETTUS. I think it will be agreed to as the Senator from Maine stated it.

Mr. HALE. I propose that the debate upon the pending bill and amendments shall close at 4 o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. The Senator from Maine says "pending amendments." As the Senator from Maine knows, I have three small amendments which I desire to offer to the bill, and there are three or four letters from the War Department which I wish to have read in support of them. I do not think the amendments will consume more than ten minutes. Now, the Senator's proposition will cut off amendments and cut off any remarks——

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. CLAY. On amendments not now pending.

Mr. HALE. Of course I must have some limitation. My proposition applies not only to amendments now offered, but to be offered and pending at 4 o'clock. Then I shall ask that this bill be laid aside and the House bill upon this subject be taken up and considered until half past 5, and that then a vote be taken upon it. By that time we will be in such condition that while debate will be shut off, we can consider all other amendments and dispose of this bill before 6 or half past 6, so that I will not be obliged to ask the Senate to have an evening session. My proposition covers not only amendments offered now, but amendments which may be offered before that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BACON. Let me understand the Senator from Maine.

Mr. MORGAN. I am obliged to say to the Senator from Maine that I shall ask consideration of the amendment I suggested to him to-day, which I will read.

Mr. HALE. That will come up naturally as an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. In the event that the amendment meets with any contest at all, there will necessarily be a much longer debate than two hours. The bill reads as follows:

To be used as an advance to the Panama Railroad Company, to continue the reequipment of the railroad of said company, $1,000,000.

I propose to amend it by striking out the words "as an advance to the Panama Railroad Company;" so that it will read:

To be used to continue the reequipment of the railroad of said company, $1,000,000.

Mr. HALE. I shall not object to the amendment. I am in favor of it.

Mr. MORGAN. Let the amendment go in, and I will make no objection to the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. Let the Senator move it now.

Mr. MORGAN. I move it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. In line 12, page 176, strike out the words "as an advance to the Panama Railroad Company;" so that the clause will read:

To be used to continue the reequipment of the railroad of said company, $1,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. Now I have no objection to the agreement.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator let me get my agreement through, and then the bill will be open to all amendments?

Mr. NELSON. All right.

Mr. HALE. My proposition does not cut off any amendments whatever.

Mr. BAILEY. What would the Senator from Maine say to the suggestion that the appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the House bill respecting the traveling expenses of the President, and consider it until 5 o'clock—that would be two hours—and then take a vote on it, the time to be equally divided?

Mr. HALE. We have never resorted to the proceeding of dividing time in the Senate. There never is any question in the Senate. We trust to the courtesy of the Chair in that regard.

Mr. BAILEY. And the confidence and courtesy of the Senate have never been misplaced. I have never seen any Senator take advantage of it. Perhaps that is a habit I brought with me from the other side of the Capitol. I will withdraw that suggestion and rely——

Mr. MALLORY. The Senate has at times applied the rule of fixing the time to which each Senator shall be confined in the discussion; and inasmuch as it is possible for a Senator to consume the major portion of the time, inadvertently, perhaps, I think it would be very well to limit the time which each Senator shall have to discuss the question in the two hours, if we are to have two hours.

Mr. HALE. What does the Senator from Texas think of that?

Mr. BAILEY. That would be entirely satisfactory. I will say that I prefer myself the House practice. You divide the time equally, and then a Senator on each side yields as he sees fit. But I have no desire myself to introduce in the Senate the methods of the House, though I think it would improve the Senate in some particulars.

Mr. HALE. We have always left that to the presiding officer and his fairness.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly; but the trouble is——

Mr. HALE. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Florida is a good one.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the suggestion of the Senator from Florida obviates that difficulty. The trouble is if one Senator, without any limitation on the time, gets the floor and becomes engaged in a colloquy—a running debate—he might unconsciously consume more time than he otherwise would.

Mr. MALLORY. I suggest ten minutes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the Senator put the time for a vote as not later than 5 o'clock, instead of 5 o'clock definitely.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, I suggest that the appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside; that the House bill be taken up for discussion, and that the debate proceed under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. And that the vote shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the appropriation bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

TRAVELING EXPENSES OF THE PRESIDENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 20321) to provide for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter there may be expended for or on account of the traveling expenses of the President of the United States such sum as Congress may from time to time appropriate, not exceeding $25,000 per annum, such sum when appropriated to be expended in the discretion of the President and accounted for on his certificate solely.

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes authorized by this act for the fiscal year 1907, the sum of $25,000.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senate understands just what has been done. The appropriation bill is temporarily laid aside, and the House bill is before the Senate and is to be debated under the ten-minute rule and voted upon not later than 5 o'clock. It is now open to debate under the ten-minute rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President, this matter has been so fully debated that I have only a very few words to say. I simply wish to state my own view and position.

My objection to the appropriation is that it is for no public purpose whatever. It does not facilitate, and is not intended to facilitate, the performance of any public function or any public duty whatever. No case has been stated where the President has ever needed to travel over the country or to leave the capital for the purpose of performing any public duty. Cases have been imagined by Senators where the President might travel about or leave the capital and go to some point or other for the performance of some public duty, but no Senator has been able to state any case where the President ever has been called upon to leave the capital or to travel from one point to another in order more perfectly or correctly to perform his public duty.

Some positions have been stated here, Mr. President, that are remarkable to me. It has been asserted here, as an example and as an illustration of the benefits to be derived from this proposed law and this appropriation, that President McKinley, when he left the capital and went to the city of Buffalo to attend an exposition there and to deliver an address, was engaged in the performance of his official duties. I cheerfully admit, Mr. President, that when Mr. McKinley went to Buffalo and made a speech protesting against the exclusive tariff policy of the Republican party he was engaged in the performance of a duty, of a very high and patriotic duty, but it was not an official duty. It was not a duty performed by him as the Chief Executive of this country.

The speech which he made upon that occasion was not a public document, and his act was not an official or an executive act. You might as well say that any Senator when he is called upon to go back to his home or to any point in this country to deliver a public address is engaged in the performance of an official duty as to say that the President of the United States when he goes to deliver a college address or to make a political speech in any part of the country is engaged in the performance of his official duties.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] stated what I think is the true purpose of this measure when he told us how it was necessary to provide the President with special trains and to have him surrounded by an army of newspaper men and attendants in order that his addresses to the people may be properly reported, and that he may travel about over the country and give the people an opportunity to see him and to come in contact with the Chief Executive of the nation. In other words, we are to pay out of the Treasury in order to give the people of the United States a free show, and I have no doubt that at the next session of Congress the Senator from Indiana will be demanding that, in addition to providing champagne and flowers for the President and his invited guests, we shall provide roasted peanuts and pink lemonade for the people. We have just as much right to do the one as we have the other.

The only official acts of the President of the United States are those which are cast upon him by the Constitution and by the laws of the United States, and we might as well make a direct appropriation of so much money to increase the salary of the present incumbent of the office of President of the United States as to pass a law to diminish the personal expenses of the President when he is voluntarily traveling about over the United States. It seems to me that it is in plain violation of the Constitution. It is giving an additional emolument to the President and practically increasing his compensation during his term of office.

I wish to offer an amendment. I move to strike out lines 8, 9, 10, and 11 of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee proposes an amendment, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out in the blue print lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, as follows:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes authorized by this act for the fiscal year 1907, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. CARMACK. My reason for offering the amendment is this: On a casual view of it that will remove what I conceive to be the constitutional objection to the bill.

Mr. HALE. If no Senator desires to debate the proposition, let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. SPOONER. What is to be stricken out? I ask that the bill be read.

Mr. HALE. The appropriation is to be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary again read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, in the following words:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes authorized by this act for the fiscal year 1907, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish the Secretary would again read the first paragraph. It does not conform with the copy of the bill we have.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is not the same print.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to one point. I think the amendment as he sent it to the desk was originally drawn to be offered to the item in the appropriation bill, and I suggest that he examine it with a view to conforming it to the bill now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out lines 9, 10, 11, and 12 of the blue print in the following words:

There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purposes authorized by this act for the fiscal year 1907, the sum of $25,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. The word "authorized" is not in the printed bill.

Mr. HALE. Let us have a vote upon it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I ask the Secretary to read the first paragraph of the blue print, as it does not appear to be the same as the copy I have, and most Senators are presuming that this printed bill is the bill under consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the bill as introduced in the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota ask that the first paragraph of the bill be read?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The first paragraph.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. As it reads in the House bill?

Mr. MCCUMBER. As it reads in the House bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

That hereafter there may be expended for or on account of the traveling expenses of the President of the United States such sum as Congress may from time to time appropriate, not exceeding $25,000 per annum, such sum when appropriated to be expended in the discretion of the President and accounted for on his certificate solely.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK].

Mr. FORAKER. What is the amendment?

Mr. HALE. To strike out the appropriation.

Mr. FORAKER. What is left?

Mr. HALE. We will vote it down.

Mr. FORAKER. But what if it is not voted down?

Mr. GALLINGER. But we will.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. President.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER]. He being absent, I withhold my vote.

Mr. NELSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. I believe he has not voted. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PILES (when his name was called). I understood yesterday that my pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] had been transferred to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who was absent. That was not the case. The Senator from Minnesota is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. Therefore I withhold my vote. Otherwise I would vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. So I withhold my vote.

Mr. KEAN. I suggest to the Senator from Wyoming that he transfer the pair to my colleague.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. Upon the suggestion of the senior Senator from New Jersey, I make the transfer of the pair, and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] will stand paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PETTUS. The senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], with whom I have a general pair, is absent this afternoon necessarily, and I withhold my vote. Were he present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE. I voted "nay." I observe that the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] did not vote. I have a general pair with that Senator. I transfer the pair, however, to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. FULTON. I again announce my pair with my colleague [Mr. GEARIN]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KITTREDGE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] has not voted. With him I have a general pair. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). Listening to the reading of the names, it appears that the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] has not voted. I desire to ask if he did, in fact, vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He did not vote.

Mr. CULBERSON. I withdraw my vote, as I have a general pair with that Senator.

Mr. PETTUS (after having voted in the affirmative). I desire to know whether the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. PETTUS. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN. My colleague [Mr. MONEY] is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MALLORY. The junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] requested me to state that he was called from the Senate; that he desired to vote on this question, and that if he were here, he would vote against the amendment in the sundry civil bill.

The result was announced—yeas 17, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—17.

Bacon	Clay	McLaurin	Taliaferro
Bailey	Daniel	Mallory	Whyte
Berry	Frazier	Martin
Blackburn	Latimer	Rayner
Carmack	McCreary	Simmons

NAYS—35.

Allee	Clapp	Hansbrough	Nelson
Benson	Cullom	Hemenway	Penrose
Beveridge	Dick	Heyburn	Proctor
Brandegee	Dolliver	Hopkins	Smoot
Bulkeley	Elkins	Kean	Spooner
Burkett	Foraker	La Follette	Sutherland
Burnham	Gallinger	Lodge	Warner
Burrows	Gamble	Long	Warren
Carter	Hale	Millard

NOT VOTING—37.

Aldrich	Dillingham	McCumber	Piles
Alger	Dryden	McEnery	Platt
Allison	Dubois	Money	Scott
Ankeny	Flint	Morgan	Stone
Clark, Mont.	Foster	Newlands	Teller
Clark, Wyo.	Frye	Nixon	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Fulton	Overman	Wetmore
Crane	Gearin	Patterson
Culberson	Kittredge	Perkins
Depew	Knox	Pettus

So Mr. CARMACK's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CULBERSON. I move to amend the bill by adding after the word "expenses," in line 4, the words "when traveling on official business," and upon that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). Again I announce my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with my colleague [Mr. GEARIN] who is absent. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when Mr. MORGAN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MORGAN] is paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PILES (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], and I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Under the same arrangement of pairs before stated I will vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 23, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—23.

Bacon	Culberson	McCumber	Rayner
Bailey	Daniel	McLaurin	Simmons
Berry	Frazier	Mallory	Stone
Blackburn	La Follette	Martin	Taliaferro
Carmack	Latimer	Patterson	Whyte
Clay	McCreary	Pettus

NAYS—35.

Allee	Crane	Hansbrough	Nelson

Clark, Wyo.	Frye	Nixon	Wetmore
Clarke, Ark.	Fulton	Overman

So Mr. CULBERSON'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a very objectionable feature is eliminated from this bill which was contained in the amendment in the appropriation bill. The amendment in the appropriation bill provided, among other things, that not only was the President himself exempted from the operation of the general law prohibiting free traveling in the United States, but he could also exempt any number of persons whom he saw fit to exempt from the operation of that law. He could name one or he could name twenty or he could name a hundred. That makes this bill far preferable to the law which was proposed in the amendment itself.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, the bill is still open, in my candid judgment, to the same constitutional objection and the same objection on principle. I would, if I could, vote to increase the salary of the Executive of the United States. I have great admiration for the President of the United States and great respect for him. But I have equal admiration and equal respect for the American people and the average American citizen, and I would not, by my vote, willingly grant an exemption or a right to the Executive that I would deny to any American citizen. For that reason, on principle, I am necessarily opposed to this bill even as it now stands.

In addition to that there is still the constitutional inhibition against the increase of the compensation of the Execuive during his term of office. In my candid judgment, this provision is not only against the clear letter of the Constitution, but it is also against the spirit of the Constitution and the reasons which guided the framers of that instrument in prohibiting us from changing this compensation during the period of incumbency of the office.

For that reason, on the final passage of the bill, I shall feel that I can not under my obligation to support the Constitution conscientiously vote for the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill. I am as much attached to the Constitution of the United States, as I understand it, as any Senator here. I do not believe this appropriation to constitute an emolument within the meaning of the Constitution. The provision in the Constitution was intended to make Congress independent of the Executive and the Executive independent of the Congress:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other— > any other emolument from the United States or any of them.

The great object was that the President should not use his patronage to influence the Congress to increase his compensation and that the Congress should not use its prejudice and its power over the purse to starve the President into an agreement with it upon some public policy.

This last clause, in my opinion, Mr. President, was simply inserted by the framers of the Constitution to prevent an evasion of the prohibition upon an increase of compensation during the period for which the President was elected. You have to strike that word "other" out of that sentence, or else, Mr. President, it means inevitably, as a matter of logic and constitutional construction, I think, what I claim it to mean.

Moreover, Mr. President, if the contention of the Senators who oppose this bill be correct, every President of the United States from the beginning has violated the Constitution when he has approved an appropriation bill which allowed anything for the White House outside of the mere office accommodations. There is nothing in the Constitution about a White House; there is nothing in the Constitution about an Executive Mansion; there is nothing in the Constitution, construed as Senators construe it, which makes it constitutional to afford a residence for the President's family. That is a financial gain to him, for if it were not provided by the Congress he would be obliged to rent a house or to purchase one for his family. The judges have not houses in which to live, nor have the Cabinet officers, nor the Members of Congress, afforded by law. So the President directly gains financially by having a place of residence, as contradistinguished from office, for himself and his family.

Mr. HALE. Nobody has ever contended that he should not have it.

Mr. SPOONER. Nobody has ever contended that from the beginning. Since the White House was constructed it has been the home not simply of the President, it has not been simply an office, but an official home for the President and a home for his family. That is a perquisite, that is an emolument, that is a profit derived from the office, if there is any solidity in the construction which is sought to be placed upon this provision of the Constitution.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SPOONER. No; I can not. I have only ten minutes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not mean to be impolite.

Mr. President, the Constitution is violated if the President without paying rent for it puts his horses in a stable the property of the United States. Upon what theory do we buy furniture for the White House other than office furniture if this construction of the Constitution be a correct one? Upon what theory do we furnish coal for the White House except simply enough for the office if this construction be a correct one?

That constitutional provision was intended to prevent any appropriation or allowance or fee to be made by the Congress to the President or permitted which should operate to increase his compensation. It means inevitably to my mind profit. It means income. It does not mean a governmental expense. It is violated by having a flower garden for affording flowers. It was expected that the President of the United States, the Chief Magistrate of this country, must have social duties to discharge, not personally for himself, but as a representative of the Government. It was expected, Mr. President, that he would receive and entertain foreign ministers. That is a part of the diplomacy of the country.

It never was expected when the Constitution was framed and created the office of Chief Magistrate, the exaltation not by Congress but by the people of an American citizen to the highest position in the Government, that he should not live as the executive head of this Government in a manner in harmony with his station. It is in the public interest that he should do so. And so, Mr. President, from the beginning that word has received from Washington down the construction practically in legislation for which I contend.

How many minutes have I, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Three minutes more.

Mr. SPOONER. The long-continued and unbroken legislative and executive exposition of the word "emolument," as used in this connection in the Constitution, has the force of judicial construction. Moreover, it is in harmony with the good sense of the American people who are not willing that the President should be treated in a narrow and parsimonious way, absolutely inconsistent with the status of this country internationally. I call attention again to the fact that the Supreme Court, in United States v. Hoyt (10 Howard), construed the word "emolument" as I am construing it. They defined it:

Embracing every species of compensation or pecuniary profit derived from a discharge of the duties of the office.

Now, Mr. President, that is neither compensation nor emolument, in my opinion, within the meaning of that clause of the Constitution, the result of which is not to add one penny to the compensation of the President. If any remains unexpended for traveling expenses, it is not his. It is an unexpended balance, which belongs to the Government.

I have no time to discuss the question of what are his duties, but I am not ready to believe, Mr. President, that the men who framed this Constitution, who were of world-wide knowledge, intended that the hands of Congress should be tied and that the President of a Republic, elected by the people and the servant of the people, should remain a hermit confined to the White House, unless he were a man of fortune and able to travel at his own expense.

It is to be assumed that no political trips will be taken by the President. It is to be assumed by this branch of the Government that the other branches will conduct themselves with due sense of propriety and will not do those things which would obviously shock the sense of propriety of all thoughtful men. I have no constitutional difficulty in voting for this bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I did not intend to say anything, and I only rise now because I was not permitted to ask a question which I think would answer everything that has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin in reference to the mansion that is provided by the Government for the President. That is about as hollow as I ever heard from the Senator from Wisconsin, and more hollow than I ever expected to hear from him. There is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits the Congress of the United States from saying what the compensation is, provided Congress declares beforehand what shall be the compensation. It may be a salary of $50,000, and in addition to that a residence for the Chief Executive of the United States, for himself and for his family, and offices for himself and for all of his official family.

That may be done in advance, and is done in advance; but there is not anything in the world in that that is an answer to the proposition that if it had not been done, and it is done afterwards, it is an advantage to the President of the United States.

When the present President of the United States was elected and inducted into office, there was a provision for his compensation that he should have $50,000 per annum, and that he should have a residence, which is called "the White House." It is not necessary that the words "White House" should be in the Constitution, but the word "compensation" includes every advantage, every benefit, every help to the President of the United States or any officer who receives compensation. So the White House was included in the compensation that was fixed for him. The people of the United States did prepare a residence for the President; they did prepare offices for him and offices for his official family; but that has nothing to do with the providing by law against the Constitution for emolument to the President in addition to the compensation that was provided when he was elected and inducted into office.

This is not a bounty, the Senator from Wisconsin said yesterday. It is either compensation or emolument or it is a bounty. Now he denies that it is a bounty. Then it must be an emolument. Suppose the President starts out on a bear hunt to the Mississippi swamps or starts out West to hunt buffalo, and the Government of the United States pays his expenses, is that a gain to him? He would otherwise have to pay them out of his own pocket, out of the salary fixed, out of the compensation fixed for him at the beginning.

The White House has nothing to do with it. It is a question what benefit, what gain, what advantage it is to him. Nobody can deny that it is an advantage. I believe the senior Senator from Ohio stated that he was convinced it was an emolument. If it is an emolument, it can not be voted by this Congress constitutionally. Of course, every Senator has to vote upon his own judgment about the matter; but when a Senator comes to the conclusion that it is an emolument, and when the Constitution says there shall be no additional emolument, how is that Senator going to vote for this provision?

I should not have risen, Mr. President, had it not been for the shallow argument—the shallow pretense of an argument—that because compensation is fixed in the beginning of the term of the President by a salary of $50,000 and by a residence in which to live during the incumbency of the office, thereby there is an increase in the emolument if he is permitted to retain that compensation. I think, Mr. President, that can hardly rise to the dignity of an argument.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Chief of Staff of the Army may travel at Government expense wheresoever he may desire throughout the United States. Almost every chief officer of the respective Executive Departments is provided with an appropriation regularly passed by Congress from which traveling expenses may be paid. Many minor officials are likewise provided with proper appropriations for traveling throughout the country. I have no doubt whatever that if this item should read "$25,000 for contingent expenses of the executive offices, to be disbursed in the discretion of the President," it would not be subject to the objections urged upon constitutional grounds. I have no doubt that as a contingent fund for the executive offices, Senators would refrain from such objection upon the assumption that the item constituted an increase of compensation for the Chief Executive. I believe there is now a certain contingent fund for the executive offices of the President which might be increased to $25,000. This particular item, in specifying traveling expenses, and in that alone, becomes the subject of the criticisms which have been made.

It is not pretended that in any manner, shape, or form would the President of the United States profit to the extent of one farthing by the expenditure of any part or portion of this proposed appropriation.

With reference to restricting its disbursement to strictly official trips, some question has been raised, and that was put in precise language by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] in his amendment, which was disagreed to. I venture to say, in the absence of that amendment, in the face of its rejection by the Senate, that every dollar of the appropriation will be spent in connection with the official business of the United States. I am of the opinion that no greater affliction can come to this country than the election of a man to the Presidency who is not familiar with the country and is not disposed to make himself familiar with it.

I put that view further. It seems to me that every representative of a State in this Chamber and every Representative of a Congressional district in the other Chamber should, as a prerequisite, be fairly conversant with all parts of the United States. If not conversant with the country when elected, either the Senator, the Representative, or the Chief Executive should certainly endeavor as promptly as possible to become familiar with the country whose destiny, in a legislative or executive sense, is in some measure committed to his care.

This great country of ours—speaking not of possessions beyond the seas—extends from ocean to ocean. It has an enormous interstate commerce. It has people engaged in the raising of semitropical crops in the South and persons cultivating fields far to the North. It has every conceivable variety of industrial activities, and these activities are of special character in different sections of the country. We have had many Presidents who have not been familiar with the country and who have not thought proper to familiarize themselves with it by personal observation. Speaking for the section of the country far to the west, I feel that, without any reflection from a partisan point of view, I can justly say that the western portion of the United States has suffered immeasurably by the lack of intimate knowledge on the part of the Chief Executive at one time or another concerning the mighty resources of the country, the character of the people, and their fields of endeavor. We of the West should like to have every Senator, every Representative, and the Chief Magistrate as well, together with members of his Cabinet, visit that mighty region to the west of the Mississippi River.

It it important likewise that we from west of that river should become familiar with the industries and the conditions existing in New England and in the great productive South. Ignorance is but a poor basis upon which to build intelligent statesmanship, and information concerning this country gleaned from books and common report is infirm and unsatisfactory.

I believe that this item which is proposed by the pending bill may be more properly denominated a "contingent fund," to be disbursed upon the order of the President of the United States. The visits of the President to the several sections of the country are not primrose journeys. Those visits involve sleepless nights and tireless effort, and yet the visit of the President to a State or a city or a section is of infinite value to that city, State, or section. He is welcomed there by an outburst of patriotism of refreshing value to the whole country.

Mr. President, we are in the midst of times requiring that confidence in Government and public officials should be fostered and nurtured by more intimate relations between the people and their public servants, whether in the executive or the legislative branches of the Government. Confidence in the men who administer the law is often inspired by looking officials in the face and hearing their statements of public policy.

The fervid debate on this particular item brings back many old times of excitement over small matters. If anyone will take the pains to read John Bach MacMaster's History of the American People, he will be refreshed and instructed by this class of discussion, replete with ponderous arguments over small items, which has been going on from the foundation of the Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President, I do not think the construction given to the paragraph of section 1, Article II, of the Constitution, read a while ago by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], is at all logical. He places all of his stress on the two words "any other" that precede the word "emolument." As I understand the Senator, he urges that their use in connection with the word "emolument" means that the word "emolument" is used in the section as meaning "compensation." I think a little reflection will convince him that that is an erroneous view. I agree with him that no body of men ever used the English language more concisely and with a more perfect knowledge of every shade of meaning of every word used in the Constitution than did the framers of the Constitution. I think I will convince—and I think I ought to convince—the Senator from Wisconsin that the words "any other," in connection with "emolument," mean precisely the opposite from that which he contends for. The word "compensation" is the narrower word in its meaning. The word "emolument" has the wider meaning. "Compensation," I suppose, means the money that is paid to an official for his services. "Compensation" means the amount of money paid, and the framers of the Constitution having declared that the compensation to be given the President should "neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected," then, intending a wider prohibition, used the words "or any other emolument."

Mr. President, compensation is an emolument. It is paid for the services of the office. It is compensation and it is also an emolument of office. When the word "compensation" is read in that sense, then there can be no doubt as to what is meant by the words "any other emolument." The Constitution says the President shall be allowed "a compensation"—the emolument or compensation would be a fair, honest construction of the language—and then he shall be allowed "no other emolument;" which means that the "emolument or compensation" shall be given to him and that he shall receive no other emolument in whatever shape or form an emolument might take.

Mr. President, I would not say a word about this bill were it not that men do not like to be considered mean or parsimonious in dealing with the executive head of this nation, and I am inclined to think that if this were a bill to increase the compensation of the President of the United States, as a matter of course commencing with the successor of the present incumbent of the office, I should vote for it. I do not believe the people of the United States would consider that $75,000 a year would be too much, and, were it not for the constitutional impediment, I believe I would be willing to vote $25,000 additional to the salary of the present President. But we ought not to do things by indirection that we can not do under the Constitution directly, and when it is proposed to allow $25,000 to the present incumbent of the Presidential office—and I refer to the present incumbent in an impersonal way; whoever might happen to occupy the office would be referred to in the same terms—when it is proposed to allow by act of Congress $25,000 additional to be expended by or on account of the President for traveling expenses, without reference to the purpose for which the traveling shall be undertaken, clearly giving the right to the President to travel wherever he will, upon whatever mission, and for whatever purpose, either with or without reference to his official duties, such provision as that, to my mind, is undeniably an emolument that is added to the office of President, and that is attempted by this act to be given to the present incumbent, as I believe, in violation of the express provision of the Constitution.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. PATTERSON. With pleasure.

Mr. McCUMBER. Should not the words "any other" be construed the same as though it read "additional?"

Mr. PATTERSON. I think it means precisely what I suggested. "Compensation" is an emolument of the office, and when they used the term "any other emolument" instead of "any other compensation" it is clear to my mind that the framers of the Constitution intended to prohibit anything additional being given to the President by virtue of the office he held, whether in the shape of compensation or benefits of any other kind or character.

When a law is enacted that states that the President may travel at will on his own pleasure or his own business or on official business, and $25,000 is appropriated to defray his traveling expenses, that is, in my opinion, undeniably an emolument that is attached permanently to the office of the President, and that is intended to immediately benefit the incumbent of the office.

The bill would not be unconstitutional, Mr. President, as to succeeding incumbents of the office, and therein lies a complete answer to everything that was said by the Senator from Wisconsin when he suggested that the use of the White House was an emolument, that money for furnishing the White House was an emolument, if this is an emolument; and yet he triumphantly explains they would be unconstitutional if that which is proposed in this bill is unconstitutional. Mr. President, the present President has a right to those things, because they were emoluments, if we call them emoluments, that attached to the office at the time he was elected, that attached to the office at the time his predecessors were elected, and that will be attached to the office when his successor shall be elected.

Mr. SPOONER. An emolument can not attach to an office in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. PATTERSON. But, Mr. President, the unconstitutional feature of this is not that you vote an emolument to the office of the President, but that you vote an emolument to the present incumbent in addition to the emoluments that he was to receive under the law at the time he was elected. For a succeeding President it would not be unconstitutional. It is unconstitutional because in the teeth of the Constitution it is made applicable to the present incumbent of the office.

Mr. SPOONER. How was it when President Washington occupied the White House with his family when these appropriations began to be made?

Mr. PATTERSON. I do not know, and neither does the Senator from Wisconsin know, the circumstances and conditions under which the first President of the United States went into possession of the White House, but clearly it is an emolument, within the meaning of the Constitution, so far as the present incumbent is concerned.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, a very few words will suffice to indicate the tenor of my mind on this subject. At this stage of the debate I shall attempt no more. I feel constrained by my sense of the meaning and the spirit of the Constitution of the United States to vote against this bill.

I would not deal narrowly with the President or with any of the great officers of our Government. Considering the magnitude of our country, the great responsibility of the office, with the many demands which come to the men who fill them which can not be enumerated in bills against the Government, I do not think that the salaries they now receive are sufficient. I would therefore vote with pleasure and with faith that it would meet the approbation of the American people to increase the salaries paid the President and the Vice-President of the United States. I do not think we can discover in the nature of our people, however critical of public men and public measures some of them may be at times, any sense of indisposition to pay value for what they get. On the contrary, I think their disposition is to reward generously those who assume great tasks and who help them in extending the hand of this nation to foreign nations and administering their own immense affairs. If this were a bill to increase their salary, I would take particular pleasure in voting for it.

If I felt that we could fitly pass this allowance for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States, I would also vote for it; but I have listened carefully to the debate, and I have been convinced, both by the doubts expressed by some who advocate it and by the strong arguments used by those who oppose it, that it is not in line with the thought of the Constitution or the policy therein impressed in clear language, which was intended to embrace and confine the rewards of the President of the United States to the stated salary to be paid at fixed periods. The arguments have been too clear and full on this subject to call for any repetition from me.

I believe travel, Mr. President, to be the most enlightening of all forms of education. In the case of the President of the United States and those who may be, like him, in charge of the great affairs of this nation, the lack of travel is the greatest of all impediments to the broad and comprehensive discharge of their manifold duties. I wish that the President of the United States could go into every State and city and county of this Union and meet the people. He would learn what can not be learned from books, what can not be learned second-hand by hearsay. "Things seen," says the great poet of England, "are greater than things heard." And to see and know the country and people of the United States is the highest form of education that any of our officials could obtain.

The travels of high officers like the President of the United States are in a measure imposed upon them and not of their own seeking. Whether they would or no, the people desire to see them, and they are overcrowded with invitations from all parts of the domain of this great nation, soliciting them to come and accept the hospitalities of the people and give the people some opportunity to meet and for a time enjoy such sociability with them as circumstances may admit.

When we impose such great duties upon the President of the United States, and when the people spontaneously call for their performance by him, it is a disappointment and pain to me that I do not feel that I can conscientiously vote for this measure, and it is solely in response to my sincere thought as to the meaning of our Constitution that I do not vote for it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it seems to me the word "emolument" applies only to something tangible in the way of a gift or profit flowing to a party. It seems to me the provisions of this bill merely constitute the President a disbursing officer to disburse the money expended by him, for what? For something of a tangible nature that passes to him by which he may profit; that he may keep? No. The thing that passes to the President is the pleasure that he may derive from traveling, if he derives any pleasure from it. He derives no profit whatever through the expenditure of this money.

The word "expense" is a word of limitation in this proposed act, and the word "expended" where it is used of course implies that the President is to receive only so much of the appropriation, whatever it may be, as he expends; that is, as he pays out. Not one cent of it remains with him. He pays it out. It passes through his hands or through the hands of his disbursing officer.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the Senator from Idaho a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PATTERSON. Suppose the statute provided that the President should have $50,000 a year for his services and, in addition, that he might have a trip once a year to the Rocky Mountains, the expense of the trip to be paid by the Government. Would not the latter clause grant an emolument of office?

Mr. HEYBURN. It would depend upon the purpose of the trip. But, then, why imagine such a thing? We have always had Presidents in whose honor we could trust. We have not had any man of any political party in that office who would misapply a statute or the benefits to be derived under a statute running in his interest, and we may safely trust him.

This bill merely provides:

That hereafter there may be allowed to and expended by or on account of the President of the United States for traveling expenses—

"Expense" means something that has passed out, something that has been paid out by the President. I see nowhere the element of an emolument, except only such slight pleasure as the President might derive from traveling. An emolument, as contemplated by the makers of the Constitution, was something of a tangible nature that would be a profit to the party receiving it. That is the general acceptation of the term "emolument." What passes to the President under this bill except the privilege of disbursing moneys of the United States? We might provide here that the Treasurer of the United States should pay out this money, or the Comptroller, on account of the expenses of the President. But for the convenience, because of the peculiar circumstances that surround the expenditure of this money, the bill provides that the President shall, upon his certificate, have the payment made.

Does not that answer the constitutional objection that this is an emolument? Is there anything tangible about that which passes to the President that you can term "an emolument," unless it is the mere pleasure, if it be a pleasure, of traveling? Will we for a moment suppose that the President would take advantage of the privileges under this act for the purpose of going on a hunting tour?

The President is acting in an executive capacity every day and every hour of his life. He is acting in an official capacity every hour of his life. There is no moment when he is not President of the United States and acting as such, and it is safe to say that no man will ever occupy that place who would abuse the privileges of the proposed law by charging the expenses of a pleasure trip to the Government of the United States.

Therefore it seems to me the objection I urged against the amendment to the sundry civil bill can not be urged against this bill. Nor can the constitutional objection be urged against it. I should have voted against the amendment to the sundry civil bill, because it permitted the President to invite and take with him others. It is fresh in my mind that on one of the tours of a President of the United States there was in his train a car which was devoted entirely to the members of the press, who traveled at the expense of whoever paid the expenses of the trip. I would not approve of that. I would not approve of granting the privilege to the President of the United States to extend the right of free transportation to any person, except as they travel officially with him. I think the objections I had to the amendment to the sundry civil bill are entirely met by the House bill in this case.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, it has struck me as a little unfortunate that the question raised by the amendment to the sundry civil bill and by the pending bill should be magnified into an issue of public policy of a large kind as well as an issue of constitutional government. I am one of those who have regarded the travels of the President as one of the very important services of the Executive office. Our form of government is peculiar in the fact that everybody is concerned in its administration. And one of its weaknesses is the difficulty of bringing to the mass of the people a real sense of the Government of the United States. For the first half of the century of our national life that was exceedingly more difficult on account of local prejudices and sectional conditions. I think the progress of our institutions in the last forty years has been very greatly accelerated by the contact which the public at large has had with the administration of our national affairs; and to that nothing has contributed so much as the appearance among the people of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic.

I have had opportunity during the past twenty years to see the practical value of these excursions into the country of several Presidents of the United States, and we would, I think, do a very serious wrong to ourselves and especially to our children if anything were done to discourage the familiar intercourse of the Chief Magistrate with the people of the United States. There is hardly a community in our country in which the oldest inhabitant does not entertain a friend by telling of his seeing early Presidents of the United States, and I believe patriotism, in a larger sense than we are possibly aware of, has been stimulated by this personal contact of the Chief Magistrate with the people of the United States.

Now, then, that would warrant the expenditure, if it can be made properly, and I do not intend to embark in a discussion of the law of the case. I agree thoroughly with the interpretation given by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and yet I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has placed this appropriation upon its proper ground. I regard it as a contingent expense of the Executive Office. It certainly makes no profit to the President, and in that sense the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is correct in saying that it is not a compensation or in any sense an emolument personal to the President. It is, however, an expense of the Executive Office. Both Houses of Congress have already passed an appropriation—

For contingent expenses of the Executive Office, including stationery therefor, as well as record books, telegrams, telephones, books for library, furniture and carpets for offices, care of office carriages, horses, and harness, and miscellaneous items, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

Will any man say that that list can not be increased next year without encountering the bar of the Constitution of the United States? I think obviously not. I regard this appropriation therefore as a contingent expense of the Executive office, to be disbursed by the President simply because, being in charge of the transaction, he is in a better position than anybody else to disburse it. I should be very glad to see the appropriation promptly made, because everybody knows that it will not be abused either by the present Chief Magistrate or by anybody else likely to become President of the United States.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I think the attitude occupied, respectively, by the two sides of the Chamber is illustrative of the attitude of the parties on questions of this kind. The Republican party, with its latitudinous construction of the Constitution, is always willing to appropriate money from the Treasury for purposes that may be public or that may in some instances not be public, notably in such measures as the ship-subsidy bill and the high protective tariff and measures of that kind, which indicates a very wide and broad view of the Constitution, whereas on this side we are disposed always to regard it from a very narrow and strict point of view. That is aside from the constitutional question involved in this.

But, Mr. President, the constitutional question is one which has presented the greatest stumbling-block to me in the way of support of this measure. I was at first disposed to vote for it, but after investigating that phase of the subject I came to the conclusion that I could not consistently, with my duty as a Senator, vote for this appropriation. The Constitution prohibits us from increasing the emoluments of the present President, and if this is an emolument, we are necessarily precluded from voting for it. I am perfectly willing—and I have no hesitation in saying so—to admit that, in my judgment, the President's salary is far too small. I would be willing to vote to-day, if I could do so consistently with the Constitution, to double the present salary of the President. I for one am opposed to sending a President back to private life to do as some Presidents have had to do, enter into the very scuffle of life for a living. The office is too exalted for one who has held it to be compelled to rub shoulders against men in the struggle for a livelihood. It is possible we may have Presidents elected so young that at the expiration of their term of office, if they have not adequate fortunes, it will be necessary for them to go to work at whatever profession they may have followed before they were elected to that high office.

But, Mr. President, to come to the point which has given me the most trouble in this matter, the language of the bill is—

That hereafter there may be allowed to and expended by or on account of the President of the United States for traveling expenses not exceeding $25,000 per annum, to be expended in the discretion of the President and accounted for on his certificate solely.

The constitutional inhibition to which reference has been made is in the following language:

The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Mr. President, the whole question turns upon the meaning of the word "emolument." The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has given us a citation from a Supreme Court decision which defines the meaning of the word "emolument." That definition, I find, is in accord with the definition laid down by Webster and the Standard Dictionary.

I will refer to the case from which the Senator quoted. It is the case of Hoyt v. The United States (51 U. S.), decided in 1850. In that case the question came up as to the meaning of the word "emolument" used in a statute, and at the risk of boring the Senate I will read a portion of it embodied in the decision of the court:

By an amendment of this act, April 30, 1802 (2 Stat. L., 172, sec. 3), it was provided that whenever the annual emoluments of any collector, after deducting the expenses incident to the office, shall amount to more than $5,000, the excess shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury. The act was not to extend to fines, forfeitures, and penalties, a share of which the collector was entitled to, under the twentieth section of the act of 2d March, 1799 (1 Stat. L., 697).

In discussing this the court say:

At the date of the act of 1802 the compensation of the collector was derived from three sources, (1) fees allowed for the services already referred to; (2) commissions on the duties received, and (3) a share of the fines, penalties, and forfeitures. The emoluments of the office were dependent upon the receipts from these sources—

Mark the expression—

The emoluments of the office were dependent upon the receipts from these sources; and the officer was entitled to apply to his own use the whole amount derived from them.

The provision in this act, therefore, that whenever the annual emoluments, after deducting the expenses, exceeded the amount of $5,000, the excess should be accounted for, necessarily embraces in the limitation the fees as well as commissions belonging to the office, and would have embraced also the fines and forfeitures had it not been for the proviso to the act taking them out of the limitation.

The argument would be quite as strong in favor of excluding the commissions as in the case of fees, as the one can in no more appropriate sense be regarded as emoluments of office than the other, and thus the limitation would become a nullity.

These terms denote a compensation for a particular kind of service to be performed by the officer, and are distinguishable from each other, and are so used and understood by Congress in the several compensation acts; they are also distinguishable from the term "emoluments," that being more comprehensive and embracing every species of compensation or pecuniary profit derived from a discharge of the duties of the office; and such is the obvious import of it in these acts.

I suggest that a careful reading of the decision will sustain the contention of those who claim that the word "emolument" means every profit or gain that can be given to the President during his term.

It is said that this is not a profit or gain to the President. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] a while ago said that the President made no profit out of it; that is was nothing to him. But as a matter of fact this $25,000 a year, if expended, would be a saving of $25,000 a year to the President. It would be a profit to that extent. The fact that the money does not go into his pocket does not alter the fact that he receives the benefit of it. It strikes me as a mere quibble to say that this is not such a benefit or profit as is contemplated by the Constitution in the language of the clause here in controversy.

Therefore, Mr. President, in view of the plain language of the Constitution, in view also of the action of the framers of the Constitution, and contemporaneous interpretations of that action as read here this morning by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAURIN] from the Federalist, in one of Mr. Hamilton's articles, by following the history of this clause through the Constitutional Convention, when it was introduced by the State of New Jersey as a provision of the Constitution, in which introduction it contained a provision inhibiting——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Florida has expired.

Mr. MALLORY. I am sorry, Mr. President, I was not allowed to enlighten the Senate on that point.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, the discussion of this bill is related somewhat to the discussion of the pass amendment to the rate bill, which occupied so much time in the Senate during the present session. It is not my purpose to attempt to settle the controversy with what I have to offer, which is merely in the line of information for the Senate, showing how these matters are handled by other governments. I have on my desk books which confer railway transportation upon certain officials in the government of Canada. This one [exhibiting] is railway transportation issued to members of the House of Commons of Canada. Another [exhibiting] is issued to senators of Canada, and like transportation is issued to other officials, presumably the Governor-General, the premier and his cabinet, and others. It is a part of their law which grants this right. An extract from the railway act of 1903, chapter 58, provides:

The company—

Referring to the railroad companies—

shall furnish free transportation upon any of its trains for members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, with their baggage.

And the same provision is made for other officials. Provision is made for its restoration in case of loss, and the list of those to whom the privilege is extended is printed in the book itself. With the permission of the Senate and for its information, these can be furnished to the Reporters and printed in the RECORD.

It does in a sense carry out the suggestion which was made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], that because of certain favors which the Government grants these transportation lines favors of this character may be rightfully issued to Government officers.

In time, if not by the legislation now pending, provision will be made either by an appropriation or by an issue of this character from the carrier to public officials as a right for free transportation. It was stated, and I assume with approximate correctness, that we are paying more than $50,000,000 annually in mail contracts to these carriers, admittedly rich and profitable contracts, and we grant them certain privileges and grants and ample protection. We transport our supplies and our troops over their lines at an immense if not an enormous cost. In return it may be considered, and I have no doubt some day will be considered, as but a fair return that this sort of transportation shall be issued to certain Federal Government officials. In a degree it is carried on now, I believe, with certain post-office officials, post-office inspectors being among the number.

I will say in conclusion that in my judgment it would not be an unfair exaction, where we make these generous contracts with carriers, that transportation of this character might reasonally be issued as a matter of right to public officials, from the President down, as might by careful legislation be stipulated.

The matter submitted by Mr. DICK is as follows:

Railway transportation. Members of the House of Commons, Canada, 1905. Names of members of the House of Commons, alphabetically arranged, with number of certificate set opposite each name, in connection with their railway transportation under the railway act, 1903.

FORM OF CERTIFICATE.

[Obverse side.]

No. ——

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Canada, ——— ——, 1905.

——— ——— is a member of the House of Commons of Canada, and is entitled by law to free transportation, with his baggage, upon all railway trains in Canada. Railway act, 1903.

Attest:

THOS. B. FLINT,
Clerk of the House of Commons.

Not transferable.

[Reverse side.]

This certificate expires December 31, 1905, when a new certificate will be issued in its place.

———— ————,

NOTE.—In case of resignation or death of a member, notice will be given, so that his name may be scored out and that of his successor entered next to the last one on the list.

Should a member lose his certificate, another one bearing the same number will be issued to him with the word "Duplicate" written in red ink across its face; the railway companies in each case, being notified accordingly.

NOTICE OF ISSUANCE OF TRANSPORTATION TO TAKE PLACE OF LOST CARD.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,
Ottawa, September 1, 1905.

DEAR SIR: In the absence of the clerk of the House, I beg to state, for the information of your company, that Mr. Louis A. Rivet, M. P., has lost his transportation identification card, No. 0170, and that another one, 0214, has been issued to him in its place.

I am, dear sir, yours, truly,

R. P. KING.
(For clerk of the Commons.)

G. B. COLLINS, Esq.,
Central Ontario Railway Company, Trenton.

Railway transportation. Senators of Canada. 1905. Names of senators alphabetically arranged, with number of certificate set opposite each name, in connection with their railway transportation under the railway act, 1903.

NOTE.—In case of resignation or death of a senator, notice will be given, so that his name may be scored out and that of his successor entered next to the last one on the list.

Should a senator lose his certificate, another one bearing the same number will be issued to him with the word "duplicate" written in red ink across its face, the railway companies, in each case, being notified accordingly.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, I believe I will offer an amendment to the bill. I do not desire a yea-and-nay vote on it, however.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "solely," in line 7, add the following:

No part of such sum shall be expended for the traveling expenses of any person except the President, members of his family, attendants in the regular service of the Government necessary for his protection, and officials necessary for the President's transaction of official business of the Government on the occasion of such traveling.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. McLAURIN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KEAN (when Mr. DRYDEN's name was called). My colleague [Mr. DRYDEN] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FULTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with my colleague [Mr. GEARIN], who is absent. I, therefore, withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LONG (when his name was called). I again announce the transfer of my general pair with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER], and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN (when Mr. RAYNER's name was called). The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] is necessarily absent from the city. He is paired with the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. If the senior Senator from Maryland were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. I have arranged to transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The pair of the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] has just been announced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I am requested to state that if the absent junior Senator from Maryland were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GAMBLE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. I will transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. CLARK]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McLAURIN. I wish to state that my colleague [Mr. MONEY] has a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay" on this bill.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will transfer my pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] to the junior Senator from California [Mr. FLINT], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN. Under the transfer of pairs which has been arranged, by which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] stands paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. DRYDEN], I will vote. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—42.

Allee	Crane	Hemenway	Perkins
Ankeny	Cullom	Heyburn	Piles
Benson	Dick	Hopkins	Proctor

Culberson	Fulton	Nixon

So the bill was passed.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Under the arrangement, the appropriation bill is now before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is now before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I have two or three formal amendments to offer. Has the amendment on page 157 been agreed to?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Then I ask a reconsideration of that vote, because I wish to perfect the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the amendment is open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. On page 157, line 13, after the word "capacity," I move to strike out the word "whether."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 14, I move to strike out the words "or otherwise" after the words "United States."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In line 22 of the same page, and line 6 of the next page, I ask to reconsider the vote by which the word "October" was adopted, so as to restore the word "December."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 157, line 22, the word "December" was stricken out and the word "October" was inserted, and also in line 6, page 158.

Mr. HALE. That has been reconsidered, and if the amendment is rejected, "December" remains.

The SECRETARY. It will then read "on and after December 15, 1906," in the first place, and "on or before said December 15, 1906," in the second.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment inserting "October" in lieu of "December" is disagreed to.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, on the amendment which has just been reconsidered, if this change is to be made from October to December, I wish to say a word, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I shall not resist the change, but I think I ought to explain briefly why I asked the amendment to be made in the first instance, and why I believe it ought to be retained.

The bill as it stands at the present time requires the Commission to Revise and Codify the Criminal and Penal Laws of the United States to report by the 15th day of December, 1906. That Commission has had this work in charge for something like eight or nine years. It has been promising, so I am informed by Members of the other House who have been constantly looking after the work, to report year after year. It promised to make a report by December, 1905, and it failed to do so.

Now it is proposed to appoint a joint committee—the resolution has passed the House and come to the Senate—to verify the work that this Commission has done. If that Commission shall conclude its work so as to bring it before the next session of Congress and have the revision acted on at that time, in my judgment, it is absolutely necessary that the committee shall sit in vacation and shall have at least one month prior to the meeting of Congress to devote to an inspection of the work of the Commission.

Therefore I suggested the amendment that the Commission be required to make its report by the 15th day of October, 1906. Then the committee could take it up, put in a month or such a matter before Congress convened, and would be in a position to report to Congress, and Congress could go over it and take up the measure and adopt the report at the next session. Otherwise, it seems to me, that the work will necessarily go over beyond the next session, because any person who has any comprehension of the vast volume of work the committee will have to perform and the importance of the work will understand that it is work which can not be done during the session of Congress. It will have to be done in vacation if done at all. The members who are on other committees can not devote the necessary time during the session to a verification, examination, and inspection of the work of the Commission.

With that explanation, I shall not oppose the restoration of the word if the Senator from Maine thinks it is proper. I felt that I was called upon to give this explanation, because I offered the amendment at the suggestion of Members of the other House who have given it very careful investigation.

Mr. HALE. I think it is better that the House proposition remain, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Maine, and, as I understand it, with the approval of the committee, I offer an amendment on page 128, after line 14. There are two amendments that I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 128, after line 14, insert:

For a reenforced concrete bridge over Pea Vine Creek, Georgia, on the road from Reed's bridge to Ringgold, $4,500.

Mr. BACON. I will simply state that both these amendments are recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. Yes; and they are all right

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. The second amendment follows the one just agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

For the partial reconstruction of the Alexandria Bridge over the Chickamauga River on the eastern boundary of the Chickamauga Park, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Both amendments relate to Government roads. I ask permission to have letters from the Secretary of War and the chairman of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission printed in the RECORD, without being read.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 18, 1906.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I take the liberty of inclosing for your consideration a copy of a letter addressed by the Secretary of War to the President of the Senate, and also a copy of a letter from the chairman of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission, recommending an appropriation of $6,000 for the reconstruction of two bridges, one being within the approaches to and the other on the eastern boundary of the park. In view of the urgent necessity for this work, as set forth in this correspondence, it has occurred to me that you might take a personal interest in the consideration of this matter by the Senate.

Very truly, yours, ROBERT SHAW OLIVER, Assistant Secretary of War.

Hon. AUGUSTUS O. BACON, United States Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, June 18, 1906.

SIR: I have the honor to submit, for the consideration of the Senate, the accompanying letter from the chairman of the Chickamauga and Chattanooga National Park Commission, setting forth the necessity for the immediate reconstruction of two bridges, one being within the approaches to and the other on the eastern boundary of the park, involving an increase of $6,000 in the appropriation contained in the pending sundry civil bill for the maintenance of the park during the ensuing fiscal year.

The chairman submits the following clauses of proposed legislation to accomplish these objects, and, in view of his earnest representations as to the necessity for this work, I beg to heartily recommend this additional appropriation, viz:

For a reenforced concrete bridge over Pea Vine Creek, Georgia, on the road from Reeds Bridge to Ringgold, $4,500.

For the partial reconstruction of the Alexander Bridge, over the Chickamauga River, on the eastern boundary of the Chickamauga Park, $1,500.

Very respectfully, WM. H. TAFT,
Secretary of War.

THE PRESIDENT UNITED STATES SENATE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
CHICKAMAUGA AND CHATTANOOGA NATIONAL PARK COMMISSION,
Washington, June 7, 1906.

SIR: Your attention is respectfully called to the fact that the Pea Vine Creek Bridge, over Pea Vine Creek, and on the road from Reeds Bridge, on the Chickamauga, to Ringgold, is in immediate need of reconstruction. This bridge is on the road made one of the park approaches by act of Congress approved August 19, 1890. It is a very old wooden structure, in the last stages of decay, and we propose to replace it by a reenforced concrete bridge.

There is also in need of immediate partial reconstruction what is known as the Alexander Bridge, over the Chickamauga River, on the eastern boundary of the park.

Our estimate of the cost of proper bridges is $4,500 for the Pea Vine Creek Bridge and $1,500 for the Alexander Bridge. We have not the necessary funds to reconstruct these bridges, nor are they provided for in the sundry civil bill, as reported by the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives for the coming fiscal year, and therefore suggest a proper amendment to the sundry civil bill to be presented in the Senate.

Very respectfully, E. A. CARMAN,
Chairman of Commission.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. HALE. The only amendment reserved is on page 144.

Mr. KEAN. Will the Senator from Maine correct the provision on page 27?

Mr. HALE. There is a correction to be made on page 27.

Mr. KEAN. In line 2.

Mr. HALE. On page 27, line 2, let it read, instead of "two laborers," "one skilled laborer."

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 2, strike out the words "two laborers" and insert "one skilled laborer."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. With the permission of the Senator from Maine, I desire to offer a small amendment on pages 148 and 149.

Mr. HALE. On page 148, line 23, after the word "erection," the words "or purchase" should be inserted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 148, line 23, after the words "for the erection," insert "or purchase;" so as to read:

Court-house and jails in Alaska: For the erection or purchase of a jail, repairs to the court-house, and construction of fireproof vaults for the records of the clerk of the court, all at Nome, Alaska, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Now, the only other amendment is on page 144.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana proposes an amendment, which will be read.

Mr. HALE. I think the amendment I have just offered covers the point.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment offered by the Senator covers one of the points, but I should like to have the amendment stated. The amendment of the Senator from Maine covers the first point.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 149, after the word "used," in line 6, insert:

But if the jail building and equipment now being used at Nome can be purchased for less than the cost of remodeling and completely furnishing and equipping said marine-hospital building for jail purposes, such purchase shall be made.

Mr. HALE. I can not agree to that. I think the Senator ought to be content.

Mr. CARTER. I will strike out the word "shall" and put in the word "may."

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator ought to be content with the amendment that I have proposed in line 23.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. Now, the only remaining amendment to be offered is on page 144.

Mr. NELSON. I move to strike out the following proviso on page 144, beginning in line 7:

Provided, That this appropriation shall be available only under the condition that no bar or canteen shall be maintained at said Homes for the sale of beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors.

Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate at this late moment in a lengthy discussion of this matter. As an old soldier I feel an interest in the welfare of these veterans. Many of them, as a result of service in the Army and of subsequent life, have to a greater or less extent acquired the habit of occasionally taking a little beer or other stimulant.

In this matter, Mr. President, we are confronted with a condition rather than a theory. I recognize the fact that the good people who are opposed to the canteen in the Army do it for a very good purpose. Their idea is that they can make these old veterans strictly temperate and prohibition. If that could be accomplished, I would heartily join them in that effort, but the experience of all managers of our Soldiers' Homes goes to show that if these veterans can not have a place of entertainment, a place in the Home where they can secure a little mild beverage like beer, or something of that kind, they stray from day to day outside of the Home, go into purlieus where the vilest and meanest kind of saloons are kept, and the poorest and meanest kind of liquors, and there these old fellows become intoxicated, become helpless, and if they happen to have any change they are despoiled of that. The result is that the officers of the Homes have to go and hunt up these old fellows, and bring them back and take care of them and put them through a course of medicine to get them into a sort of fair condition again after they have been out. The parties who have these saloons outside in the vicinity of these Homes are opposed to these canteens, and it happens in this case, as we have often found it, that the prohibitionists and the saloon keepers cooperate.

But, Mr. President, I am unwilling to take up the time of the Senate further. I simply ask to have read a communication from Mr. M. R. Patrick, a late governor of the Soldiers' Home at Dayton, Ohio. This communication puts the case as clearly as can be before the Senate, and I ask that the whole of the communication may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota asks that the communication sent to the desk by him may be read. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Annual report of Central Branch National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers for the year ending June 30, 1887.

CENTRAL BRANCH,
NATIONAL HOME FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEER SOLDIERS,
Dayton, Ohio, August 1, 1887.

GENERAL: I have the honor to submit the following report of this Branch for the year ending June 30, 1887:

Soon after the commencement of this last financial year (July 12) a beer hall was opened here in the Home for the benefit of its members.

As is well known to the Board, it was a matter that had been under discussion for years. In the Army it has been the usage to sell beer certainly for more than half a century, and for several years (I know not how many) at the other Branches of the National Homes.

For some reason, I know not what, a terrible outcry was made through the press, through the mails, and by personal appeals to the governor for the redress of this outrage upon the members of the Central Branch and upon the interests of good order, good morals, and religion generally.

Possibly the fact that the governor had been known for more than fifty years as an active temperance man, both in military and in civil life, may have had something to do with this onslaught upon him as a renegade. It is very true that the governor would gladly close every saloon in the land if it were in his power, but inasmuch as this Central Branch is hedged in on all sides by saloons, dives, and hells of the vilest character to entrap our men the moment they are outside of the gates, it seemed wise to choose the less of the two evils, either to furnish them with the best article of beer that can be purchased in the Home at a cheap rate, and retain our men under our own control, or suffer them to go outside, get drunk on the vilests drinks of every kind, get robbed of their money and kicked into the street, or secreted in the infamous dives that surround us until their money is exhausted and they are turned out penniless.

The statistics and records of this Branch for the past year speak for themselves:

The official report of Hon. Ira Crawford, mayor of Dayton, gives the number of arrests of our members from July 12, 1885, to July 1, 1886, as 486, while for the same length of time after the beer hall was opened (July 12, 1886, to July 1, 1887), as 274, a difference of 212.

The surgeon reports that the small number treated for alcoholism this year (fourteen), as compared with thirty-eight in 1886 and thirty-five in 1885, is without doubt, in his opinion, to be credited to the less number of members who are given to protracted debauches and bad liquor since the opening of the beer hall. Only such cases as can not with safety be treated out of the hospital are brought to hospital for treatment after a spree, and those treated in camp, especially at the guardhouse, are not one-fifth as many this year as in former years.

That a large number of our men will drink to excess when they have the opportunity is true, and notwithstanding the watchfulness of our employees at the beer hall, these shrewd old topers will manage to get tight; but on leaving the beer hall, if they show intoxication, they are at once sent up to the guardhouse, to remain until the next morning, without having had an opportunity to kick up a row in town or on their way home, or along the avenues of the Home.

Still another result: The beer we furnish is of the very best, and the man who gets intoxicated on it to-day is fit to be turned out to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock with a clear head and ready for duty, whereas a town drunk renders a man unfit for duty two, three, and four days.

Once more: The cry that less money would be sent by pensioners and employees to their families is disposed of by the showing of the treasurer's report and that of the postmaster.

The discipline and good order of the Home have never been as good as now within the last six or seven years at least, nor have the men been as contented.

I am happy to say that candid men and women of the most intense prohibition proclivities, who have been here at the Home and in Dayton making investigation fairly on the spot, have decided that under the circumstances it is best to leave the Home authorities to the exercise of their own judgment in this matter.

It is only theorists and fanatics at a distance, who know nothing of the circumstances, who keep up the cry, "Down with the beer saloon at the Soldiers' Home!" There are those who for their own purposes make statements to the effect that the men of the Home are induced to patronize the beer hall for the pecuniary benefit of somebody, presumably the Home authorities. It is true that the Home authorities and all connected with the Home are benefited by the expenditure of money inside of the Home instead of outside, the profits accruing from the sale of beer within the Home going to the post fund, which, as seen by the treasurer's report, has been very largely increased, thereby enabling the council of administration, of which the governor is chairman, to greatly increase the band, to afford more frequent amusements and of a higher class, to replenish library, reading room, etc., and, in general terms, to expend a large sum of money during the last year with the sole object of giving pleasure, comfort, and enjoyment to the men beyond what is provided for by Congressional appropriations.

It is not to be supposed that it is our object to make money, even for these purposes, at the expense of the health or morals of the men.

As we find it necessary we place restrictions upon hundreds of our men, some being entirely debarred from the beer hall and others being limited to one or two glasses, according to their physical, mental, or moral condition.

It is the opinion of every officer of this Home, whether prohibitionist or otherwise, that under existing circumstances the beer hall has reduced vice, crime, debauchery, sickness, and the waste of money that should go to the families of members in a very marked degree.

Very respectfully, yours,

M. R. PATRICK, Governor.

Gen. M. T. MCMAHON,
Secretary Board of Managers,
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.

Mr. HALE and Mr. NELSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I thought I was entitled to the floor. I had not concluded.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. NELSON. No; I have here certain statements made by Archbishop Ireland before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, bearing on the same subject. I have known Archbishop Ireland for many years. He is one of the best temperance men in the country of whom I have knowledge. I should like to have his views on this subject read.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NELSON. I will yield for a question.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate to a statement in regard to the Dayton Soldiers' Home directly connected with the document previously read.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator can do that in his own time. I am not yet through.

Mr. HALE. I sought the floor, thinking the Senator was through, to move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I can hardly yield to the suggestion of the Senator from Maine that I shall be debarred from a discussion of this proposition.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the statement of Archbishop Ireland presented by the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Archbishop Ireland and Bishop McGoldrick appeared before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee understands that you desire to say something on the canteen question?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to hear you.

Archbishop IRELAND. What I wish to say is based, first, on my general knowledge of the manner of treating the liquor question with any class of people, and, secondly, from what I have heard and observed regarding the working of the canteen at Fort Snelling, Minn.

So far as the general method of dealing with the liquor question is concerned, it has been my experience that it is useless to try to prohibit absolutely the use of liquor, and the world, made as it is, men having the tastes they have, if we are too severe and try to do away altogether with the use of liquor, men will find it in ways illegal and ways more harmful than they otherwise would do. And, so far as I speak of the question of the Army canteen, I have observed myself and have heard it said that the soldiers at Fort Snelling go far more seldom to St. Paul to visit saloons in St. Paul and the saloons immediately bordering on the military reservations now that the canteen is established than they did formerly when there was no canteen. They find in the camp, in the establishment, that they can have beer and wine under reasonable conditions, and they are not tempted to sneak out, as they say themselves, and get drunk.

It was well known formerly they would go into St. Paul, and particularly so after pay day, and the result would be the following day a large number of them would turn up in the police courts. And then I know that along the military reservation it was the custom of three or four miserable saloons to establish themselves expressly and exclusively for the purpose of furnishing liquor to the soldiers—liquor of the worst kind—and not only furnishing liquor, but furnishing everything that makes for iniquity. The soldiers, when under the influence of liquor, are considered a prey for every vice and every iniquity, and much of the immorality to which some of them may be exposed comes from the use of liquor outside the forts, outside the camp grounds. Even if they were to take a little too much within the forts, they are protected against other evils—evils against which there is no protection for them when they are outside.

I know some time ago, some years ago, in the vicinity of Fort Snelling, houses of the most infamous kind were established in the name of saloons, to attract the soldiers. Now there is far less chance for anything of that kind, far less chance for drunkenness, and still further less opportunities for immoralities of a more serious character. And I think for the soldiers it would be better if they were allowed a little beer. There is no use in thinking that they will become total abstainers. Very few of them will become total abstainers. What those in charge of their morals should do is to eliminate danger and reduce their drinking to moderate temperance. I say this, although all my life I have been a total abstainer, and have worked for the last thirty years in the cause of temperance, and have induced people by moral suasion in many cases to take the total-abstinence pledge, and have induced thousands and thousands to do that. But when I am dealing with the people at large I am convinced that the only satisfactory and successful way is to eliminate dangers, as far as possible, and to reduce the drinking to a minimum.

I have advocated high license, gentlemen, in St. Paul and Minneapolis, instead of prohibition, and I have succeeded in reducing the consumption of alcoholic liquors by that policy. I am sure the same plan would work better among the soldiers.

As to Fort Snelling, from what I have heard and observed, drunkenness has been reduced a great deal, and immorality of a worse kind has been reduced yet more, because the soldiers have been kept at home. If they get a glass of beer there they will stay there, and if they are not able to get a glass of beer there they will sneak out, as they themselves say, and become intoxicated. I understand the canteen regulations are very good, and they can be made even more stringent, in the discretion of the Secretary of War.

The trouble with the soldiers has been that there has been no recreation in their camps or in the forts. After drills the soldier is tired and dull, and if he can go into the post exchange and sit down and talk and take a glass of beer right there it is far better than to have him go out and take it in a place where there is no object in view but to rob him.

The CHAIRMAN. We had an officer here who has stated that the savings of the men since the canteen has been established have been very considerable, and that from the fund created they are enabled to give the men magazines and newspapers, and so on?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes; that is true. Bishop Goldrick, of Duluth, has always worked in the temperance cause. He is here with me to-day. He is a total abstainer himself, and I would like you to hear what he has to say on the subject of the canteen or post exchange.

Senator HARRIS. You spoke of a certain class of vile houses around the Fort Snelling Reservation.

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes, sir.

Senator HARRIS. Has the number of those houses been diminished since the establishment of the canteen or otherwise?

Archbishop IRELAND. I could not answer that directly. The only answer I can give is from the men and officers, who have told me that since the establishment of the post exchange conditions are infinitely better; that the number of such houses has been diminished to a great extent. Of course the exact number I could not myself say. Formerly I was around the fort and I knew about those things. I knew that, while they were ostensibly saloons, those houses were in reality houses of prostitution, and that the object was to get the soldiers there and get them drunk and get their money. And so I say that the canteen is far better for the soldiers and that there is far less immorality under this system.

Senator BURROWS. Just one question, if you please. Some excellent people make this objection, and I would like you to answer it: That the young man who has never been in the habit of drinking at all is tempted to drink by the canteen and led to the curse of drunkenness later on. What do you say about that?

Archbishop IRELAND. My answer is that that man in the Army is rather a rare article.

Senator BURROWS. I wanted your statement to go to the country.

Archbishop IRELAND. And, secondly, if the rare article does turn up, as it may, and he has been able to resist the temptations of the saloon in ordinary life, I think he will resist the temptations of the canteen.

Mr. NELSON. Without taking up the time of the Senate to read it, I ask that the statement of Bishop McGoldrick may be inserted in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF BISHOP M'GOLDRICK.

Bishop MCGOLDRICK. My experience has been very much like that of Archbishop Ireland. I have been long connected with Fort Snelling; I visited there frequently, and I have spent many days visiting there and around St. Paul and Minneapolis, and I can bear out what Archbishop Ireland says from my own experience. In talking with officers of the Army everywhere I can safely say that I never found anyone acquainted with the workings of the canteen who did not say that it was a good thing, and, gentlemen, officers, I think, are always the best judges of the soldiers' needs. The officers look after the soldiers; they are anxious about their welfare and their standing; they want to see that they do what is best for them; that they take proper exercise and proper care of themselves, and I believe a very large percentage—I do not know how many it would be safe to say, but a very large percentage—of the officers of the Army are on the side of preserving the canteen, and, as I think, with good reason. I believe the opposition to it is more fanatical than anything else.

I know that the idea has gone abroad among a great many that we must not touch or taste any alcoholic liquor; that it is a kind of mortal sin to take a glass of wine even. That idea was spread abroad, and people who are anxious to do away with drinking entirely have spoken of it being a dreadful crime to offer the soldier any opportunity of drinking. I believe that, and, so far as I am concerned, my hearty testimony is in favor of preserving the canteen under wise regulations, such as the Army has established.

Senator WARREN. You have spoken of the officers of the Army being in favor of it. What is your observation regarding the officers of the Army as to their principles of sobriety? Do you find them generally total abstainers or temperate men?

Bishop MCGOLDRICK. I have always found the officers of the Army temperate men.

Senator WARREN. A large percentage of them?

Bishop MCGOLDRICK. A large percentage temperate; yes, sir.

Senator WARREN. And what is their influence; what influence do they seek to exert over their men; is it one in the line of temperance or otherwise?

Bishop MCGOLDRICK. It is in the line of temperance.

Senator WARREN. Both as an example and otherwise?

Bishop MCGOLDRICK. Always.

Archbishop IRELAND. One thing is overlooked, which I alluded to myself, by many people who discuss the canteen question. It is this matter of prostitution, which is, of course, fatal to the soldier—soul and body. They only look at the mere drinking; but when a soldier goes outside to drink, outside the fort or reservation, he is generally tempted to go further. That is the danger.

Senator WARREN. And to gamble?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes; also to gamble. You will find soldiers arrested in houses of prostitution. They are arrested, and then we ask: "How did you get there?" The explanation is that they went outside and got drunk in some of these vile saloons, and they were induced to go to these houses from the saloons. The agents of these houses are there, and they are there particularly for the purpose of inveigling the soldiers into these houses. The houses that I refer to are on the borders of the fort and are houses of prostitution—all of them. If a soldier does take too much to drink in the fort, he is not exposed of course to this other and greater evil. Outside those two evils go together. When the soldier gets drunk outside the fort he is led to something worse. And so I say, even if the drunkenness itself were not diminished, I would rather that a certain degree of drunkenness were to prevail in the fort than to be allowed to the soldier outside.

But, on the other hand, my own conviction is that the dangers are far less for drunkenness in the fort, and, at any rate, the amount there furnished is regulated, and there is a certain esprit de corps among the men that keeps them from abusing their privilege of taking beer. It is regarded as a respectable place to gather, and the men generally would not like to see the canteen become a place for getting drunk. If the man there takes too much, he is somewhat tabooed.

The CHAIRMAN. And he is restricted in his drinking, he is not allowed to drink too much?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes, sir; that is better yet. Of course, if people could do away with all evil, it would be better for the world, but my policy is to deal with the world as it is.

Senator WARREN. It is a straight case of choosing the lesser of two evils?

Archbishop IRELAND. Yes, sir. I am a total abstainer myself; but I do not think it is a mortal sin for a soldier to take a glass of beer or for an officer to allow a soldier a glass of beer. I believe in temperance and in suppressing drinking as much as possible, but I can not accept the statement that has been made by others before this committee that it is infamous for the Government to allow the canteen; that this is a nefarious traffic, and that we ought not to sanction it in any way. I can not accept the principle that it is in itself a nefarious traffic.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator the date of that testimony?

Mr. NELSON. I do not remember the date. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] can tell the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. That is testimony taken before the Military Committee when the matter of Army canteens was under consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, the bishop was discussing the conditions when the canteens existed. They have not existed for several years. He speaks of the lack of the means of recreation; but since then Congress has appropriated $2,000,000 to provide recreation for the soldiers.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. NELSON. I will not further take up the time of the Senate, but will merely ask to have incorporated in my remarks a petition signed by Mrs. J. C. Kelton, representing the Woman's Army and Navy League, relating to this subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The petition referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF MRS. J. C. KELTON, REPRESENTING THE WOMAN'S ARMY AND NAVY LEAGUE.

Senator PROCTOR (acting chairman). The clerk will read the petition which is before us.

The clerk read the petition referred to, as follows:

A petition by the Woman's Army and Navy League.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 15, 1904.

We, the members of the Woman's Army and Navy League, an organization composed with few exceptions of women closely related to officers in the Army and in the Navy and in the Marine Corps, do earnestly petition the Congress of the United States to pass the bill (S. 5703) introduced by Senator Proctor on December 7, 1904: "That so much of section 38 of an act entitled 'An act to increase the efficiency of the permanent military establishment of the United States,' approved February 2, 1901, as prohibits the sale of beer in any post exchange or canteen at posts located in States where such sale is not prohibited by the law of the State, is hereby repealed."

We make this petition after a careful study of the effect the prohibition of the sale of beer at post exchanges has had upon the enlisted man since February 2, 1901.

The object of the Woman's Army and Navy League (organized in 1887) is to promote the general welfare and contentment of enlisted men, and judging from the numerous reports of Army officers of all ranks and from every branch of the mililtary service recommending the restoration of the canteen as it existed prior to February 2, 1901, we think that it is quite in order that we should add our voice in the interest of the moral and physical well-being of the soldier.

We therefore beg that the Military Committee in the Senate and the Military Committee in the House of Representatives will give this vital matter their dispassionate consideration.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the hour is late. I do not propose to take up any of the time of the Senate upon this question. I have a great mass of papers and of figures, presented in the other House, going entirely in the opposite direction from the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota and the statements read at his request. I have a great respect for Archbishop Ireland, whom I know very well, but his testimony has been already taken care of by what the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has said. I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate by submitting these figures and talking about them. My proposition is to leave the matter to the Senate by moving to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. That presents the whole question to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I have another amendment bearing on the same subject on the next page of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Very well. Let the Senator put that in. Then there is a very important amendment which I wish to withdraw.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Before the Senator from Minnesota leaves page 144, I desire to say that at the appropriate time, if I am allowed to do so, I shall offer an amendment to the proviso on that page.

Mr. NELSON. On page 145, relating to the appropriation of money for soldiers' homes conducted and carried on by the States, I move to strike out the proviso beginning in line 2, after the word "maintained."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 145, line 2, after the word "maintained," it is proposed to strike out:

And provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be apportioned to any State or Territorial home that maintains a bar or canteen where intoxicating liquors are sold.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume the Senator is aware of the fact that that is the existing law, and that it is not a new provision in this bill.

Mr. NELSON. I am aware of that fact, but I will move to strike it out. I think that question should be left to the State authorities of each State to determine.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the amendment on the table. It is existing law.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk to take the place of the proviso on page 144, beginning on line 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 144, line 7, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That this appropriation shall be available only under the condition that no bar or canteen shall be maintained at said Homes for the sale of beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

Hereafter there shall not be maintained at any Branch Home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers any bar or canteen for the sale of beer, or wine, or other intoxicating liquors.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Maine, who seems to have the floor, will permit me to offer a few suggestions, I will be very much obliged to him. I will not unduly take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to leave that entirely to the discretion of the Senator. He understands thoroughly, for he has had long service here, the necessity for getting this bill through. I will not move to lay it on the table if the Senator desires to speak.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I want to call attention, in the first place, to the condition of the Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee. I have here a statement and diagram in regard to the canteen question. It will be remembered that at the Milwaukee Soldiers' Home there is a canteen; in other words, they sell beer and light wine in the military grounds there. It has been claimed by those who are in favor of the canteen system that when there is a canteen at a soldiers' home or a military post there are no saloons or other resorts of that character about the premises. I have here some pretty good evidence to show that, notwithstanding the fact that there is a canteen at the Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee where the soldiers may get their beer and other intoxicants, there are fifty saloons and resorts of that kind as near to the grounds of the Soldiers' Home as they can get. So that the existence of the canteen at a soldiers' home or at a military post does not do away with dives and groggeries outside.

In regard to the Dayton Soldiers' Home, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to this fact: I find in comparing the question of discipline at the Washington Soldiers' Home, where there is no canteen, with the Dayton Soldiers' Home, where there is a canteen, that the percentage of total offenses of all kinds at the Washington Home in 1905 was 0.218, while at the Dayton Home, where they have a canteen, it was 0.57 per cent.

Mr. President, I will not go into the figures on this question, but I want to insert in the RECORD a statement covering all these National Homes. It is from the report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and covers a period of six years. The summing up shows that at the Washington Home, where there is no canteen, the percentage of offenses is 0.175 and at the Central Soldiers' Home, where they have a canteen, it is 0.578 per cent. The average for seven Homes where the canteen exists is 0.389 per cent, while at the Washington Home, where there is no canteen, it is, as I have said, 0.175 per cent. I will not go into the subject further, but if I had the time to do so the testimony would be conclusively in favor of the amendment. I ask that the statement which I send to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the statement referred to by the Senator from North Dakota will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yes; for a question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask the Senator from North Dakota whether the Washington Soldiers' Home is not peculiarly favorably situated for the maintenance of discipline? Are there any groggeries or saloons in the neighborhood of the Washington Soldiers' Home?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are not supposed to be any within a mile of the grounds.

Mr. PATTERSON. Those who visit the Home know that the grounds are unusually large and spacious and commodious. There are no saloons in the neighborhood of the Home, and for that reason, in so far as the absence of liquor altogether will tend to promote discipline and good behavior, it is situated, I imagine, as is no other Soldiers' Home in the country.

A fair comparison, it seems to me, would be to take a Soldiers' Home, situated as a good many of them are at least, with saloons in their immediate neighborhood, and having a canteen, and compare the discipline in it with that in a Soldiers' Home without a canteen. I do not think the comparison of the Washington Home with Homes outside of the District of Columbia gives a fair idea.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think it is entirely fair, as the average conditions at the other Homes are very much the same as I understand they are here. At least I am so advised.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate any longer. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD a letter which has been received by Congressman LITTLEFIELD, of the State of Maine, from Mr. E. B. Furbish, chaplain at State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, Bath, N. Y. I will not ask that it be read, but simply that it be inserted in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK STATE SOLDIERS AND SAILORS' HOME,
Bath, N. Y., June 21, 1906.

Hon. CHAS. E. LITTLEFIELD.

DEAR SIR: Permit me to express to you my gratitude and the gratitude of my comrades for your wise, efficient, and successful efforts in the House of Representatives toward protecting the Soldiers and Sailors' Home from the degrading influence of the canteen. May I ask you to mail a copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 12,

Tuesday, 1906, containing your remarks in favor of this question, to M. H. Furbish, Portland, Me.?

Sincerely, yours, with gratitude and respect,

E. B. FURBISH,
Chaplain (Protestant) New York State Soldiers and Sailors' Home, Bath, N. Y.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. For a question.

Mr. CLAY. If I understand the Senator's amendment, practically it differs from the House bill only in that the House provision is a prohibition against the canteen during the next fiscal year, while the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota means perpetual prohibition.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It makes it permanent.

Mr. CLAY. That is the only difference between it and the House bill?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I think it ought to be made permanent, in view of the fact that the Congress of the United States has repeatedly declared in favor of prohibiting the canteen. I think it ought to become the permanent policy of the Government. That is all I have to say, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to submit some observations and to place in the RECORD some protests from churches and other religious organizations against striking from the bill this provision which the House in its wisdom has inserted. But I will refrain from that, and simply ask that some brief extracts from a statement made by Mr. Joshua L. Baily, a very distinguished citizen of Philidelphia, who visited all these National Soldiers' Homes, may be placed in the RECORD.

I also ask to have inserted in the RECORD a letter I received yesterday from Joseph H. Bradley, of One hundred and fifteenh street and Broadway, New York City, who signs himself "Late Chaplain at Southern Branch, N. H. D. V. S." On those documents I will rest the case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Hampton.—The beer hall was the subject of careful investigation at each of my visits. The approach to it was indicated by a pile of empty barrels, as well as by the file of men returning from their drink, whose breath, as it were, seemed to blaze the way. It is a one-story building about 35 by 130 feet in dimensions, but notwithstanding its spaciousness one has some difficulty in getting inside because of the crowd. The bar extends the full length of the interior, and behind it stands a cashier and three bartenders, who appear to be kept constantly employed. At one of my visits I found men in line, not only fronting the bar, but extending outside the door and standing close together for a distance of at least 150 feet, waiting their turn to be served. They paid their money to the cashier, who gave to each a ticket of the value of 5 cents, which they handed to one of the other of the bartenders, and each getting his mug of beer passed on to the other end of the building and outside.

There were about 200 men in line.

A CEASELESS ROUND OF DRINKS.

I noticed that many of them, after passing out, joined the line again to go in for a further supply, and I learned that it was possible for a man to get as many as three mugs of beer in the course of an hour. Indeed, I could discover nothing to prevent a man from keeping this up as long as his money held out. There are twenty tables on one side the hall at which from four to six men could sit, and these are occupied by the old and infirm, and the tables, as well as the men, are usually pretty full so long as the hall is open. And this is nearly all the day, excepting an hour and a half interval for dinner. Indeed, such is the eagerness for the drink that the men form in line even before the doors are open, and often, as I was informed, as many as 100 to 200 may be seen impatiently waiting the opening. I learned that it was not at all unusual for men to drink four or five beers in the morning and as many more in the afternoon, and that some drink even more than that. There is practically no restriction as to the quantity, so long as they can pay for it and not become so intoxicated as to be disorderly. That they do become intoxicated several men were in evidence whom I met on the grounds. I had a conversation with a surgeon in one of the hospitals and learned from him that not all of the inmates of the Home were drinking men, but that there were a certain number who were habitual drinkers, and these could be found with almost undeviating regularity every day at the canteen, and that the supply of the invalids in the hospitals came largely from that class, but he added these significant words: "Poor fellows, they don't live long."

At one of my visits (March, 1901) I went directly from the beer hall to the police quarters and there found fifty-seven old soldiers waiting trial for misdemeanors. The cases were all heard and disposed of by the governor of the Home, Capt. P. T. Woodfin. The court sits twice a week. These were represented to be the accumulation of three days.

* * * * * * *

BEER WHETS THE TASTE FOR STRONGER DRINKS.

Do the facts admit of any other conclusion than this, that the inside beer hall is a constant stimulant to appetite, an appetite which becomes insatiable and seeks its further indulgence on the stronger liquors to be had outside; and is there not a grave inconsistency in the position of the Government, which, in maintaining a liquor saloon, encourages the men in the very misdemeanors for the commission of which the Government punishes them.

* * * * * * *

DOES NOT LESSEN OUTSIDE DIVES.

The apologists for the canteen contend that by the sale of beer and light wines to the soldiers at the Home and on military reservations they prevent them from going outside to get stronger and more injurious liquors. This is their theory, and it is honestly held by many. But their theory has not stood the test. It is contradicted by the actual results. The inside supply of the milder kinds does not prevent them from going outside for the stronger. The ever-present facility by which they can obtain the one is an ever-present stimulant, which, instead of satisfying, quickens the appetite for the other and sends them outside to seek its indulgence.

* * * * * * *

From the conditions which I have attempted to describe we can draw at least this conclusion—that is, that the Government in maintaining the canteen inside the grounds of the Home is responsible for the mischievous results. The appetite for drink is continually nurtured, and the desire for stronger liquor is created and seeks its indulgence when the men are at liberty to go outside the grounds, with the resulting drunkenness, which is of daily occurrence. The most practicable if not the only remedy would seem to be the abolition of the canteen and the prohibition of beer as an intoxicant, not now included in the interpretation of the prohibitory rule as to intoxicating liquors.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTEENTH STREET AND BROADWAY,
New York, June 21, 1906.

Hon. JACOB H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: Most earnestly desiring to see the canteen abolished from the National Soldiers' Home (and all military posts) I beg leave to give facts from my nine years' service as chaplain at the Southern Branch, Virginia.

The efforts to promote temperance among my needy and weak comrades were made almost hopeless and ineffectual by the counter influences of the canteen. Intemperance has brought the great mass of the members of the Home to shame and destitution. Such seek refuge in the Home as a harbor where they can with comparative impunity indulge their evil appetites and devote their pension money to their gratification.

The great body of the drinking men are not satisfied with beer from the canteen, but form a procession from morning till night going out to the neighboring saloons. The presence of the canteen encourages the propensity to drink, and inflames the thirst for stronger liquor, and sends the victim outside to satisfy it. While a great many confirmed inebriates have been brought under good influences, and shown a desire to refrain (often resisting the temptation for months, or a year, and have solemnly pledged themselves to abstinence) yet the constant presence of the canteen, and the sight of their intimate friends and associates frequenting it, bringing the smell of it into the common quarters, talking about their drinking, etc., almost certainly soon overcomes the good resolution to reform, and these go back to their old habits, they become discouraged and disheartened, and give up in despair.

Drunkenness is the vogue in the Homes, and every effort to reform brings ridicule on the individual who shows this disposition, and his failure encourages contempt for the religious influences under which he sought in vain for help. Thus the canteen is the chief stumbling block to the reformation of the drinking, weak, old soldier.

Thus the canteen pollutes the whole moral atmosphere of the Homes. It so greatly encourages intemperance that membership in the Home is in itself a common byword of contempt in the neighboring communities. The men of respectable character brought there by misfortune are forced into close association with a multitude who glory in the shame of their degradation by drink, and instead of finding a peaceful, respectable retreat in their old age and necessity, are thrust into close contact with a mass of humanity which provokes only disgust and misery; their natural and just sensibilities are hourly offended and constantly outraged. The maintenance of the canteen under the authority of the Government practically offers a premium for intemperance, and contravenes every religious effort that a chaplain can put forth. It is made the duty of a faithful chaplain to denounce the influence which the Government maintains through the operation of the canteen. This is unmilitary, as it is also illogical.

There is no more crying need in the National Homes than to put intemperance truly under the ban; instead of which it is encouraged and supported. The care of the nation for its weak, helpless, and dependent veterans and saviors is misnamed and not in evidence in maintaining the canteen in the Home.

I am, very respectfully, yours, JOS. H. BRADLEY,
Late Chaplain at Southern Branch, N. H. D. V. S.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes have it.

Mr. HALE. If the Senate desires that, I have nothing to say. I think it is very unsafe to put the matter into conference. We had better retain the House provision as it was sent over. I do not know what will happen if it goes into conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the noes have it. The noes have it, and the motion is lost.

The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes have it. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not think Senators understood the proposition. I myself voted——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the Secretary again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 144 of the bill, line 7, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to strike out:

Provided, That this appropriation shall be available only under the condition that no bar or canteen shall be maintained at said Homes for the sale of beer, wine, or other intoxicating liquors.

And insert:

Hereafter there shall not be maintained, at any Branch Home of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, any bar or canteen for the sale of beer, or wine, or other intoxicating liquors.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. On page 175 I wish the amendment reported by the committee to be disagreed to because the question was settled by the Senate by its vote yesterday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 175, line 7, after the word "two," the committee proposes to strike out the following:

Provided, That no part of the sums herein appropriated shall be used for the construction of a canal of the so-called sea-level type.

Mr. HALE. Let that be disagreed to in order to conform to the action of the Senate.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HALE. I hope the bill may be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I present a conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill. I trust there will be no objection to action upon it at the present time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18198) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 12, 13, 14, 15, 26, 39, 40, 43, 44, 45, 46, 53, 60, 61, 62, 63, 69, 71, 72, 74, 79, 81, 85, 91, 92, 93, 96, 97, 99, 100, 103, 104, 117, 119, 122, 123, 125, 127, 128, 129, 148, 150, 157, 159, 163, 168, 170, 172, 178, 188, 193, 196, 199, 200, 202, 208, 209, 211, 212, 213, 216, 237, 240, 245, 246, 248, 250, 258, and 261.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 4, 5, 7, 8, 10, 16, 17, 18, 19, 21, 22, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 41, 47, 49, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 70, 73, 75, 78, 80, 83, 84, 87, 89, 94, 95, 98, 101, 102, 108, 109, 111, 113, 114, 116, 120, 124, 126, 130, 131, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 151, 152, 154, 155, 156, 160, 161, 162, 165, 171, 174, 176, 177, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 186, 187, 190, 197½, 201, 204, 205, 206, 207, 210, 215, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 230, 231, 232, 236, 241, 242, 249, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 260, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, and 269; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$98,359;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the end of said amendment, after the word "five," insert "and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to refund any excess taxes paid on such returns by reason of such penalty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "three;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $15,800;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the number proposed insert "four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 24, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$178,687;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 25, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$45,020;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Omit from the matter inserted by said amendment the words "chief of circulating department, one thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$28,060;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 48, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "by the Commissioners for any other purposes than to visit such points within the District of Columbia as it may be necessary to visit in order to enable them to inspect or inform themselves concerning any public work or property belonging to the said District, or to do any other act necessary to the administration of its affairs;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,750;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "For the erection of suitable tablets to mark historical places in the District of Columbia, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on the Library, five hundred dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 52, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "where," insert the words ", on account of the character of the work;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 76, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following; "Girard street, between Twelfth street and Brentwood road, northeast, grade, $4,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 77, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after said amendment as a paragraph the following: "Massachusetts avenue, from S street to Belmont road, grade and improve, $5,900."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 82, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert: "$123,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 86, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows:

Add after said amendment as separate paragraphs, the following:

"For purchase or condemnation of an approach to the Anacostia end of the new Anacostia Bridge, and the grading and improving of such approach, and grading and improving the extension of Monroe street to the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River, and for constructing a suitable bridge to carry said extension of Monroe street over the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, all in accordance with plans approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, $54,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the said Commissioners are authorized to enter into a contract with the said railroad company or other parties for the construction of such bridge and approaches; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, the land necessary for the extension of Monroe street with a width of sixty feet from Harrison street northward to the Anacostia River, and of the south approach to the new Anacostia Bridge, with a width of sixty feet, to connect with said extension of Monroe street by a curve passing over the tracks of the Alexandria branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad; and such condemnation proceedings as may be necessary for this purpose shall be conducted under the provisions of subchapter one of chapter fifteen of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, and such sums as are necessary to pay the expense of said condemnation proceedings and to pay any damages or excess of damages over benefits that may be allowed to owners of land taken is hereby appropriated: Provided, That such portion of this cost shall be borne by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company as is provided in section ten of an act entitled 'An act to provide for a Union Railroad Station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes,' approved February 28, 1903, and said sum shall be paid by the said company to the Treasurer of the United States, one half to the credit of the District of Columbia and the other half to the credit of the United States, and the same shall be a valid and subsisting lien against the franchises and property of the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and shall be a legal indebtedness of said company in favor of the District of Columbia, jointly for its use and the use of the United States as aforesaid, and the said lien may be enforced in the name of the District of Columbia by bill in equity brought by the Commissioners of the said District in the supreme court of the said District, or by any other lawful proceeding, against the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company: And provided further, That the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company shall pay toward the balance of the cost of the construction of said approaches and bridge over the said tracks of the Baltimore Railroad Company the sum of $3,750, to be collected in the same manner as the cost of laying pavements between the rails and tracks of street railways, as provided for in section 5 of 'An act providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia,' approved June 11, 1878, and paid into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

"And the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company is hereby authorized and directed to construct and operate a double-track street railway along the said south approach and extension of Monroe street provided for herein to intersect with its existing tracks at Monroe and Harrison streets, said line to be completed and equipped by September 13, 1907, and within thirty days thereafter the said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company shall remove its rails from and restore the paving on the portion of its line hereby directed to be abandoned, to wit: along Harrison or Bridge street, lying west of Monroe street and on the present Anacostia or Navy-Yard Bridge: Provided, That the said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company shall within sixty days after the completion of its new line herein specified, pave that portion of the approaches to the Anacostia bridge now being constructed and Monroe street extended lying between lines two feet exterior to the outer rails of its track, said paving to be of such character as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may determine: And provided further, That when in the judgment of said Commissioners they shall deem it safe and proper to construct over the newly filled approach to said bridge the necessary conduits and appurtenances to operate a street railway by the underground or conduit system they are hereby authorized and directed to notify said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company to construct such necessary conduits and appurtenances over so much of its lines between the said new bridge and Franklin street, Anacostia, and upon failure or neglect of said railroad company to complete the work of installing such conduits and appurtenances within six months after the date of such notification said railroad company shall be subject to a fine of not less than twenty-five dollars for each and every day during which it fails or neglects to install such conduits and appurtenances, which fine shall be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of said Commissioners.

"And the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company is hereby required to pay a final sum of $15,000 toward the cost of construction and the use of the new Anacostia River bridge, in addition to any sum to be paid or expended by said Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad Company for approaches, and in addition to any sums required to be expended by said railroad under existing law for construction, maintenance, and repairs, and the said sum of $15,000 is hereby declared a valid and subsisting lien against the franchises and property of said street railroad company and shall be a legal indebtedness of said company in favor of the District of Columbia jointly for its use and the use of the United States. And the said sum when paid or collected shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia."

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 88, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$1,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 90, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,040;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 105, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$250,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 106, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$18;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 107, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$25;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 110, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"For officers: For superintendent of public schools, $5,000; two assistant superintendents at $3,000 each; secretary, $2,000; clerk, $1,400; two clerks at $1,000 each; one messenger, seven hundred and twenty dollars; in all, seventeen thousand one hundred and twenty dollars; and members of the board of Education shall serve without compensation."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following:

"For teachers: For one thousand five hundred and seventy-seven teachers, to be assigned as follows:

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call up the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that it has gone to the Government Printing Office and has not been returned.

Mr. PENROSE subsequently said: My attention has been called to the fact that the conference report on the Post-Office appropriation bill is printed in full on page 8785 of the RECORD, and as there is no controversy over the report I ask unanimous consent that the conference report may be taken up for consideration and disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The report will be read.

[The Secretary read the report, which appears elsewhere in to-day's Senate proceedings.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the report.

The report was agreed to.

SURVEY OF CONEY ISLAND CHANNEL, NEW YORK.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19680) directing the Secretary of War to cause an examination and survey to be made of Coney Island channel, to report it favorably without amendment, and as it is a very brief bill I ask unanimous consent for its consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPALACHIAN AND WHITE MOUNTAIN FOREST RESERVES.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4953) for the purpose of acquiring national forest reserves in the Appalachian Mountains and White Mountains, to be known as the Appalachian Forest Reserve and the White Mountain Forest Reserve, respectively.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to give notice that when this bill shall have been disposed of, I shall move an executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 13 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 23, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 22, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF RAILROAD SIDINGS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, from the Speaker's table, the bill (H. R. 19682) authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to permit the extension and construction of railroad sidings in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is this the bill that enables the street-car lines to extend their tracks to the Union Depot?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; it relates to another local matter, and imposes no burden on anyone.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagreed to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 6, 7, and 10, had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 544. An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Great Falls, Mont.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 1326. An act granting an increase of pension to Ora P. Howland.

The message also announced that the Senate had excused Mr. DUBOIS and Mr. CLAPP from further service on the conference committee on the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, and the Vice-President had appointed Mr. GAMBLE and Mr. STONE in their places.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the order of the House the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the pure-food bill, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER] will take the chair.

Mr. CURRIER took the chair.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that in the practice and history of legislation misleading names, sometimes high-sounding, moral, and even pious names, are used to deceive the people as to the character of vicious and pernicious legislation. I do not mean to declare that this legislation per se is vicious in all respects, but in some respects I regard it as exceedingly so. People are expected to believe that, being lined up against this legislation, we are against pure food; but this is a false position, in which the strategists have sought to place those who oppose this bill and demand regular and orderly legislation for the government of the people in a proper manner. The talk about arraigning us and aligning us as opposed to pure food is foolishness. We are used to good food. We do not know anything about all that pile of corrupt and adulterated misbranded stuff that the propagandists working up this bill have succeeded in piling up in the last ten years, industriously gathered from every quarter, throughout the length and breadth of the United States. I would like to improve the food of some sections of the United States. I would like for the philanthropists who are looking out for the health and comfort of the people to start somebody out to teach people to make good, honest biscuits, and how to make good, honest corn bread. [Laughter and applause.]

They can then do good in a great many places not far from here by teaching people how to cook vegetables by boiling decent bacon with them instead of old ham or beef, and how to make honest coffee. [Applause.] But they start at the wrong place. The truth is, they get wrong ideas in their heads—some people do—and in other cases rival interests start fights on one another. They naturally go to Congress, and people who go to Congress are usually those with sinister purposes or conflicting business interests. They follow it up by getting up a literary bureau and scattering literature and petitions and stirring up agitation all over the country, getting up a hysteria that, under the misleading name of "purity," will scare people into asking Congress to do something it has no business to do. You may just as well get the traditional boy with his sore toe and hold it up in an aggravated form and let my brother the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] speak about the horrible condition of that sore toe for two hours and say that therefore Congress ought to do something to cure that sore toe. It is just as logical and sensible and fully as constitutional.

Mr. Chairman, the history of this bill has been a varied and checkered one. It was originated, in my memory, by a venerable statesman now dead. He worked upon it with but little progress. Upon his demise it was inherited by the beloved chairman of our committee, and in one form or another it was before our committee for a good many years, and all these old familiar bottles and jugs and packages have been before our committee time out of mind, endeavoring to run us into hysteria. They are no strangers to us members of the committee. At first I had one ally, and then another, and then another. I remember in the outset my ablest coadjutor, in opposing this legislation as absolutely unnecessary and unwise, was my friend and esteemed colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who made such an able and beautiful and lovely speech about the horrors of those commodities that I could not eat last night nor this morning. [Applause.] Somehow or other he was conciliated; I don't know how; I don't know what constituents were pleased or anything about that; but I know I lost his able support forever, that a great "change came over the spirit of his dream" and he is now leading the hosts of error.

My next coadjutor was my beloved friend the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]. He fought manfully. He was a Hercules in the fight, but the committee placated him by giving him codfish and beans; and there is a monument in this bill to his reconciliation and victory over the majority of our committee in the shape of a provision that wherever preservatives are used which must be removed mechanically or by maceration in water, the purity or impurity of the article shall not be judged until the preservative has been removed by maceration or otherwise and is ready for use. Beautiful provision, beautiful! Wise diplomat! Any man can go in and say the fool cook did not know how to macerate it, that the fool cook did not know how to remove the preservative, and anybody can escape. My noble friend must laugh over his triumph. He can be happy with his codfish and beans. My next coadjutor was the refined and elegant and distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS], but he stuck in the bark and never did reach the core of the bill. My beloved friend from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] was another who stood by me, and the last, but he was the same way. As far as he got would be to say "I object to some things in the bill as sumptuary legislation." The only two allies I have ever had on the committee who helped me oppose the bill on correct principles and stuck to them are my present associates in the minority views, Mr. BARTLETT and Mr. RUSSELL.

The legislation has been as fickle and uncertain as my changing associates. The Senate worked on it all the time, and somebody over there have their own ideas. In the hands of the present sponsor in the House the legislation suffered mutilation until the shades of Statesman Brosius would not have recognized it at all. The lobbyists of all sections pulled and hauled at it, every interest and faction seeking selfish ends in the legislation complimented one another as lobbyists and enemies to the bill until they secured changes without number and some without character; so that the present distinguished sponsor appeared disgusted enough to cast off his adopted bantling.

And finally when the Senate bill came over, the renovated Brosius, Hepburn, Taylor, and Hough, doctor and drug store and patent medicine, patent legalized makeshift to disappoint its friends and delude the people, was substituted for the Senate bill, I confess nothing was lost. I do not think there is ever any danger of losing by substituting one of these bills for another. If you could lose both in the swap, it would be lucky for the people. So you see the course and current of this legislation has been as uncertain and irregular as the shifting silt that disturbs navigation in a sandy stream. It requires a wary pilot and constant soundings to hold the current, and even then the boat runs aground. When people and associations, moved by the lobbyists agitating the various interests at stake, try to write Congressmen advocating support of the legislation, they actually do not know what to call it. The lightning changes, worthy of a professor of legerdemain, keep them in the dark, and they sometimes call it the "Heyburn bill" and sometimes the "Hepburn bill."

The truth about it is, Mr. Chairman, the bill from first to last violates every principle of our Government by proposing to go into sumptuary legislation for the regulation of the table menu, and I suppose the next step will be to prescribe the table etiquette and dress. The bill does not, even in its title or caption, pretend to rise to the dignity of Congressional jurisdiction. There is not one word in the title about interstate commerce. You can read it, and you will find that it simply proposes to do certain things to prevent the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, etc., and after going through all the folly of all the pages of the bill, with all the committee amendments, even down to the last on page 28, the committee then takes another whack at the title and tries to amend it, and yet do not say that it has anything in the world to do with interstate and foreign commerce. The first section of the bill provides for the punishment of adulteration and misbranding, and it has this peculiarity, really a legal curiosity:

It provides that if a man does a thing knowingly he may be imprisoned, but if he does a thing without knowing it he shall simply be fined. That is another innovation in the way of law. It has always been the popular belief among lawyers and courts that the severity of the punishment was regulated according to the enormity of the crime. If the essential elements of guilt are there, it is a question for the court, according to the circumstances of the crime itself, how much or whether the guilty party may be fined or imprisoned. But a crime is a violation of penal law in which there must be a joint operation of act and intention, and if a man does not know that he misbrands or adulterates, he is not guilty at all. In the second place, the provision in that first section provides to treat all foreign countries with more decency than the States of our Union. It is provided that if a man, no matter how he packs and prepares commodities for shipment to foreign countries, no matter whether in compliance with this law or not, if he complies with the law of the foreign country it shall be sufficient. We demanded that courtesy for the States. We say the Constitution requires it for the States and the Constitution will preserve it regardless of what Congress can do. We tried in the language of the Supreme Court of the United States to amend this bill to limit it to the District of Columbia and the Territories. The Supreme Court, in cases cited in the minority report, have expressly declared that in the District of Columbia and the Territories alone can the provisions of this bill be constitutional, and in a case similar to those that would arise under this bill it was distinctly held that a demurrer to an indictment should be sustained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no use to have hydrophobia against State lines nor talk about a man marching in red-handed rebellion because he says there are some things that Congress ought not and can not do. We are talking about the Constitution of the United States and the legislation by Congress thereunder. So far as the purposes of this bill are concerned, the only purposes and uses of State lines are simply to separate geographical divisions of parts of the country which are charged with local self-government, to attend to their own business instead of piling it upon Congress, and I say to you, Mr. Chairman, after listening to all the witnesses, listening to the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], hearing all the tales of woe about these things that affect the stomach and affect the pockets of the people, I have never yet heard presented a solitary case that any State in this Union in its own courts can not punish if you will just produce the evidence. The trouble is, gentlemen make this mistake: Venue is the same in all courts, whether Federal or State. You must allege an act to be within the jurisdiction and prove it within the jurisdiction. You can do that in one court as easily as in the other, but the coon in the woodpile, in my judgment, is this: In the State courts people are in the habit of attending to their own business and looking after their cases. In the Federal court sometimes, as provided in this bill, the entire expense and trouble of hunting up the cases and conducting the prosecution is piled upon the Government. And right here you will find the great inducement to a great many interests to support this bill that it is provided that after this arbitrary standard-making concern that we are creating over here shall have discovered or think they have grounds for prosecution the Government shall take the matter up and prosecute it without expense to anybody, with all the attendant evils of spies and informers and pestiferous agents running around meddling with the business of the people.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will my friend yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Let me suppose this case, which is pertinent to your argument. You say people will go and prosecute in the State courts. My information is that these wholesalers go to, say Brown & Co., and say "Now, you agree to sell my goods and not to sell any other competitive goods;" and he makes that kind of an agreement, and he does sell no other goods except what that manufacturer makes. Do you think Brown & Co. would go before the grand jury and indict the firm or manufacturer who proved to be their friend in such a contract as that?

Mr. ADAMSON. If I understand you, even this law would not be effective in that case.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You say the Government furnishes agents whose business it is, and we compel and pay them to go and look up evidence against parties to indict manufacturers—to indict Brown & Co.—and if they are particeps criminis——

Mr. ADAMSON. I can not tell the gentleman from Tennessee who will or who will not in any jurisdiction assume the trouble of the prosecution. What I say is this: That the men who are injured ought to feel interest enough in it, as we do in the States in other matters under police regulation, to get after the fellow who swindles them.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This firm of Brown & Co. would be very slow to say they are injured in such a case. They could say they buy from the manufacturer, their friend, and sell to the people a thing the manufacturer sells to them, and unless the people complained the chances are there would be no complaint.

Mr. ADAMSON. I think, Mr. Chairman, the people are the ones who should complain.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that under the State law of Massachusetts the last few years a similar condition he has described has been dealt with and the parties prosecuted and the practice broken up under the State law——

Mr. ADAMSON. No doubt about that——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What business is that—the tobacco matter?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Tennessee further reminded me of a feature that has struck me throughout this entire investigation, and that is these complaints, so far as I know, have not come from the consumer, except in an artificial way—sending back literature—but the movements and the hearings have all been in behalf of the business interests.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will my friend yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The plain people, who are not scientists, who are not doctors, who are not fine lawyers and judges, and have not the information, intelligence, and experience of my friend from Georgia, they can not tell whether these things are deleterious or not. Here is a little child that is sick, here is a man's wife sick, or all are sick, and he does not know the cause. The doctor comes, and he can not tell the cause. He just says: "GAINES, you are sick; you are bad off, and I do not know what has caused your illness. I will get you soon," etc.——

Mr. ADAMSON. I know a great many good lawyers and good doctors outside of Washington or the present service of the Government. I knew a great many before I came to Congress, and I think all of my constituents and all of the gentleman's constituents know where to get doctors and where to get lawyers, and I think they get them when they need them. And I desire to say now that people are expecting too much from the idea hinted at by the gentleman as to scientific knowledge as to accuracy and safety on all questions. I believe there are millions of old women, white and black, all over my country, who know more about good victuals and good eating than my friend Doctor Wiley and all of his apothecary shop. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, the feature about which I was talking when my good friend from Tennessee interrupted was the pestiferous feature of the bill. It is provided here that after this board constituted to create standards, a thing that can not be constituted by legislation, a thing that only the experience and wisdom of mankind through ages and ages of observation can establish—after they have established artificial or bureau standards and sent out spies, those spies may go and say to a man, "I want to buy something that you have got that I believe is wrong. I want to buy it for the purpose of proving that you are acting in a rascally way in your business. And if you give it me and I find it is so, I will put you in jail, and if you will not give it to me, I will have you put in jail anyhow."

It places the grocer in the fix described by my old friend Joe Cobb:

I can and I can't, I will and I won't, I'll be damned if I do, and I'll be damned if I don't.

That is the proposition to add to the pestiferousness of the administration of law and multiply the troubles of the people without a corresponding benefit.

Now, I respectfully submit that there is likely to be crime enough in the world, according to the description of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday, without the Government preparing and attuning its machinery to produce the perpetration of more crime.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not my friend believe that the Federal Government should aid the States, in policing the trouble in the States, by excluding deleterious foods from going into the States?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not; and the Supreme Court says that they absolutely have no authority to do it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Did my friend vote for the Lacey bird law?

Mr. ADAMSON. No, sir; I fought my friend from Iowa on that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You are opposed to the Federal Government helping the States to do anything?

Mr. ADAMSON. I oppose everybody whom I conceive to be attempting to violate the Constitution of the United States in this House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If my friend had been in Congress he would have voted for the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not know about that. I suppose so. I have been trying to think about the matter under consideration for the last few minutes. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You would have been for that, and I know it. That aids the States in policing the troubles in the States.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am in favor of enforcing every law that is valid; and if it is not valid, I am in favor of enforcing it until the Supreme Court breaks it and gets it out of the way.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] talks about the Federal Government aiding the States. Now, the gentleman from Georgia has given a great deal of thought to this bill, and I will ask him if it is not the legal effect of this act to repeal the pure-food laws in States like Massachusetts and other States that have very good food laws, instead of aiding them? Is it not taking the jurisdiction from them instead?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will say to my friend that it is absolutely impossible to add to or take from the police powers of the State of Massachusetts or any other State by any act of Congress. We might make trouble and confusion; we might enact unconstitutional laws; and the Administration in attempting to enforce those unconstitutional laws might make trouble, might cause confusion, might cause endless litigation; but it is utterly impossible to add one iota to the strength of the Constitution or take one iota from it. It is construed in a number of cases by the Supreme Court, cited by the minority in their report, that the Federal Government has nothing to do with the police regulations of the State. It has been expressly declared that in case of misbranding, adulteration, and fraud being charged, the original packages could have nothing to do with it even when coming from other States. In the regular course of trade they say that the original packages are inviolate if no fraud or cheat be alleged.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, Mr. Chairman. As the result of his study, I should like to have his opinion as to whether there is any food regulation that could not be as well provided by the legislature of Massachusetts as by the Congress of the United States?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Supreme Court in trying a case from your State has expressly said that it can not only do it as well, but better than any other authority, and it is the only authority that can do it. I say they said that.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I wish to reenforce it by stating that the various officials charged with enforcing the various food laws of the State give it as their opinion that their laws will operate better for the protection of the people in the matter of foods than laws of the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. In the case from your State oleomargarine had been shipped from Illinois. Your State provided against selling it under false name and color. And this simply puts oleomargarine on all fours with the cases made in this bill. The laws of Massachusetts, the Supreme Court stated, were adequate to deal with that case, and they went further, and said nobody else could do it, and they said the original package has nothing to do with it. They said requiring it to be respected in original packages was a regulation of interstate traffic, where no question of fraud or deceit as to its character had been raised, but in this case the question was squarely raised, and the Supreme Court declared emphatically that in a case where the question is raised, as had been raised there, that the original package was no exemption, constituted no exemption from the police power of the State, and then they went on and indulged in other language, and said the people who imagined that the commerce clause of the Constitution was intended to promote fraud and abrogated the police powers of the State were badly mistaken.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. So that as a result of that it appears that the State law was operating better for the protection of these consumers than the national law.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Do you take the position that the Federal Government has no power to limit the importation of poisonous substances into a State designed to be consumed as food?

Mr. ADAMSON. I take the position that the Supreme Court has declared in numerous cases that the police power of a community was to be exercised by a State, not by the Federal Government; and then they proceeded to an argument, and they said that although some of these provisions did appear to interfere with interstate commerce to a large extent, that yet it could not be helped; that the complete police power of the communities was reserved in the States by the Constitution.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. But the gentleman does not answer my question, which is this: Has not Congress absolute and full jurisdiction to prohibit the transportation of poisonous commodities for food from one State to the other?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I have told you my views of the law.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Can the State prevent it?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; it can.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Suppose I order a barrel of sugarhouse molasses at New Orleans and the merchant delivers to the common carrier, instead——

Mr. ADAMSON. He sells you one thing and delivers another.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Yes. The offense is consummated by delivering the wrong thing to the common carrier. Now, where is there any remedy for a citizen of Kentucky or Georgia in a case of that kind?

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman has stated where the venue is, and the remedy would be where the offense was committed.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And it has been decided that the delivery to the carrier is delivery to the consignee.

Mr. ADAMSON. Wherever the sale is consummated is the venue, and the venue is the place to prosecute.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. How can any Kentucky or Georgia citizen be protected in that kind of a case?

Mr. ADAMSON. I believe he would have to go to the State where the offense was committeed or trade in some other market.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the gentleman will permit me, I am intent on obtaining information here; I understand the gentleman's position to be that there is abundant power in the State to protect the commerce of the country from poisonous, dangerous, or fraudulent goods passing from one State to another?

Mr. ADAMSON. It has been so decided time and again.

Mr. COCKRAN. And that is the only authority, as I understand the gentleman?

Mr. ADAMSON. That is as much as I want.

Mr. COCKRAN. I did not ask the gentleman how much he wanted, because I know the gentleman's desires are modest; but what I wanted to ask him was his conception of the powers of the State and of the Federal Government. Do I understand the gentleman to assume that the only power is the power of the State?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand that the police powers are reserved to the States.

Mr. COCKRAN. I beg the gentleman to get away from the phrase "police power," which it seems is an elastic one, in which a great many of us manage to find that our footsteps become lost.

Mr. ADAMSON. My apology to the gentleman is that I have acquired that language from the Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding cases exactly like this.

Mr. COCKRAN. I understand that perfectly, and it is to get away from that limitation on the gentleman's intellect, and upon the procedure of Congress, that I ask his judgment on a specific state of facts, regardless of the formula.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is that?

Mr. COCKRAN. Is there any power outside of the State to protect other States from the sending of impure, dangerous, or fraudulent goods into them from one State?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will state to the gentleman, if he insists on my getting away from the Supreme Court——

Mr. COCKRAN. From the formula only.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, then, I will go by analogy, and say that if I had read the Constitution of the United States, without having heard of the Supreme Court or what it has decided, I would still be of the opinion that the States have the exclusive power to punish these things, and they ought to do it or give up their charters.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, does the gentleman deny the existence of the abuses which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] described so vividly here yesterday?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I think there is something in it; yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, is the gentleman's position this, that there being abuses, to some extent at least, of the character described by the gentleman from Illinois, and the States having clearly refused or failed to prevent the continuance of the abuses, does the gentleman say there is no remedy in the hands of the American people?

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not admit the premises of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. I thought the gentleman did a moment ago.

Mr. ADAMSON. No.

Mr. COCKRAN. Let me go back, then.

Mr. ADAMSON. Here is this premise you make, as one of your premises, that the States do not meet this difficulty.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, these evils exist.

Mr. ADAMSON. I wish to say to the gentleman that there is no law on any statute book that is not violated to a greater extent than that accumulation of ten or twelve years there would indicate in these cases.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman from Georgia yield for a suggestion there? If the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] will read the Coffee case, in 192 United States, dealing with impure coffees, he will find that the Supreme Court decided that the State of New York had plenary, absolute, and exclusive authority to deal with this particular question.

Mr. ADAMSON. It has been decided three times.

Mr. COCKRAN. The question I am trying to get light upon is a pure question of fact, and the gentleman's position as to the respective powers of the State and of the Federal Government. I decline to engage in a competition of attorneyship here.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understood the gentleman to say that the States were not doing their duty.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am asking you.

Mr. ADAMSON. That was one of your premises.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, no; I have no premises. I am putting hypothetical questions upon the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. I understand this to be his position, and if so, we can discuss it, that there is no power anywhere outside of the State to prevent the circulation of fraudulent or poisonous commodities throughout the Union; and I understand that he concedes the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that these abuses do exist, to be correct, to some extent. Now, my question is, Does the gentleman contend that there is no power anywhere to remedy this abuse, except a power that, as matter of fact, does not remedy it nor prevent it?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think I have answered that several times, but I will attempt to do it again to the gentleman's satisfaction, or my own at least. I know of no power, except the State whence shipped, to prevent anybody from shipping any kind of a package into a State. When that package reaches the State (that is, if it is permitted by the State in which it originates to start), when it enters the confines of another State, if it is a regular, unimpeached article of commerce, in an original package, it is sacred; but when any man impeaches it, and discloses that it is adulterated or misbranded or accompanied with any deceitful guise or practice, then the State authorities have ample and exclusive power to deal with anybody who sells it or offers it for sale.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman and I do not differ on the statement he has made. There is no question whatever that the gentleman's statement is correct. I still come back to the one question I have not had light upon. Does the gentleman take the position that there is no power to remedy these abuses except the power which has not remedied them and in spite of which the abuses have gone on?

Mr. ADAMSON. If I am unable to satisfy the intellect of the distinguished gentleman, I am sorry. If the State has ample and exclusive power to punish where the goods are manufactured or whence they are shipped, and if the State where they land has exclusive power to punish after they arrive, I can not see any necessity of further legislation. What you need is somebody to go and prosecute.

Mr. COCKRAN. The question still remains unanswered. There is the abuse, as the gentleman admits. What power is there to deal with it?

Mr. ADAMSON. You have laws against robbery and adultery and murder, and yet for ages the annals have been full of the violations of those statutes.

Mr. COCKRAN. There has never been any doubt about the power of prohibition in any State, but here is an abuse which has grown up in the very teeth of the State, and I ask the gentleman now if he says there is no other power than that which is shown by his own statement to be inadequate?

Mr. ADAMSON. I must respectfully dissent from that statement. I have not confessed that it is inadequate. It is adequate. The Constitution says it is adequate, the Supreme Court says it is adequate, and time and again its power and efficiency has been shown by the people of the States, notably in Georgia and Massachusetts.

Mr. COCKRAN. One moment, if the gentleman will pardon me. The gentleman is stating his position, perhaps, correctly. If all the States were as efficient as Massachusetts, and their laws as well administered, there would be no danger to public health. That is a statement nobody can question. But suppose States are negligent and remiss and deliberately permit such manufactures and such circulation of these articles, I ask the gentleman does he think and contend that there is no power in the Federal Government to protect the citizens of one State from assaults upon their health permitted by lax legislation of another State? That is the question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Without admitting the correctness of the gentleman's statement——

Mr. COCKRAN. Assuming it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Without admitting the condition in any particular State, I wish to say that Congress has no right nor power to interfere in these cases. But to the gentleman's proposition that some States do not do their duty in the matter, I call the gentleman's attention to this observation—that complaints have not come from these States admitting their inability to cope with the situation, but from business men and dealers who sing the song that the gentleman from Illinois sang yesterday, that they desire uniformity, an impossible condition convenient in commerce, and contrary to law and nature; they want to break down the requirements of the various sections of the country so they will have less trouble in scattering their business throughout the land and less danger of detection and punishment.

Mr. COCKRAN. Assuming the gentleman's statement of facts to be correct, which I am far from doing——

Mr. ADAMSON. That is my opinion.

Mr. COCKRAN. I put the question, Assuming that a State has, as in the case of the State of Illinois and the slaughterhouses, deliberately permitted the circulation in other States of food products dangerous to public health, is there no power in the Federal Government to save the people of the other States from such an invasion?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me, there is a power which resides in the legislature of each State in the Union to protect its inhabitants. The mere fact that it has not been exercised efficiently does not argue that it will not be. If the State of Massachusetts under its reserved powers has passed pure-food laws and has enforced them, will the gentleman tell me that the State of Massachusetts should be compelled to accept the standard Congress raises simply because South Dakota or some other State has not passed and enforced pure-food laws? I remember not long ago that the gentleman from New York stood on this floor and asked that the taxing power of the Federal Government be exercised in order to prevent abuses in insurance, upon the theory that the sovereign State of New York did not have sufficient power or virtue to deal with those abuses. And since the gentleman made his speech the great State of New York has acted, and its legislature has vindicated the wisdom and the virtue of its people by regulating those abuses to the satisfaction of everybody, thus demonstrating that there was no need of Federal regulation.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will indulge me for a moment to say a word in reply to that. My position on the question of insurance is exactly the same as my position on this proposal.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Yes; exactly.

Mr. COCKRAN. I believe in the absolute power of the State to deal with everything that concerns the people of that State exclusively. Its police power is unlimited; its right to regulate the movements of every citizen inside its borders can not be questioned. But when any action of that State, whether it be permissive or directory, empowers a citizen of it to affect the condition of people in another State by circulating in the channels of their commerce anything dangerous to their health and to their welfare, there is no excuse for the existence of a Federal Government if under such a condition it can not step in and say, "All the powers of sovereignty you may use as you please inside your own borders, but all the powers of the Federal Government will be employed to see that you use them with due regard to the rights of others, when anything made under sanction of your laws passes beyond your borders and affects their daily lives." [Applause.] Now, Mr. Chairman, one moment with reference to what has been said about the great State of New York. I did say that the taxing power of this Government ought to be exercised so as to limit the operations of insurance companies to the State chartering it, as savings banks are limited now, and that nothing else would remedy the evils of which complaint was had. When the gentleman says the great State of New York has dealt with the insurance frauds, I will tell him how it has dealt with them. It has confirmed the hold of the thieves on the treasure that they have been plundering. The inefficient agents of plunder, who were dismissed because they were so inefficient as to permit discovery, are replaced by more skillful tools of the same gang that planned all the infamy and profited by most of it. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I always like to hear my distinguished friend from New York——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield me just one minute?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that I loved to hear my eloquent friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], but I did not know the discussion of insurance was germane to this bill.

Mr. COCKRAN. But I did not bring it in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why, insurance is not even commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to be courteous to all gentlemen, but I have already spoken twice as long as I intended to speak, because I want to yield to others. I shall continue to yield to gentlemen as long as they wish to ask questions, but I will ask them to confine themselves to questions.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to say briefly in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] that there is not now in the National Government, or in any State, any power which will prevent men from appointing corrupt officers, but the abuse has been dealt with so far as the law is concerned, for the legislature has dealt with those abuses by revising the law. Unquestionably corrupt officials may be appointed. That can never be dealt with by law.

Mr. COCKRAN. Not one has been disturbed. In two of these companies at least they are in power now, more firmly intrenched than ever.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] seems to be disturbed about the term "police power." In a case from his own State of New York, where the pure-food law of that State was involved, decided by the Supreme Court in 1903——

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the coffee case?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; the coffee case. By unanimous opinion the Supreme Court answered the gentleman's question. He would have this House to believe that there is an original police jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The Supreme Court has said over and often and reaffirmed that there is no such power in the Federal Government; that it resides in the States.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is no doubt about that. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And I want to read a sentence or two which answers the gentleman's question. The lawyers were taking the position that he is taking, and the court said:

> We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of the opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its markets any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may by reason of such coloration or adulteration cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public.

The Supreme Court in that case sustained the pure-food law of the State of New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. There is no question about that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman whether Congress has not the power to exclude that foul article from going to another State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The other State can exclude it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think I can answer that as I answered the gentleman from New York. The State ought to prevent its being manufactured and packed and shipped, and the other State ought to prevent its being disseminated if it is shipped into it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can not Congress help to do that?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Supreme Court says not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Can not Congress prohibit——

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I must get through, and I am using the time of other gentlemen.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia declines to yield.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not want to be harsh and say I will not yield, but I want to ask gentlemen to let me conclude and yield to some other gentleman. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] yesterday asked my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] about the twelfth section. I want to say as to the latter part of that section, which declares "that food and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another, so long as they remain in original unbroken packages, etc.," that that is absolutely unconstitutional, according to the Supreme Court of the United States in the three cases cited, in one of which they sustained a demurrer to indictment, and in every case which arises under this bill a demurrer can be sustained, I believe, or habeas corpus would lie, because we can not add to nor take from the constitutional rights and powers of the States.

Now, here is a section in this bill which I suppose will please my friend the gentleman from Tennessee. A long time the question has been mooted at to what our friends on the other side would do with the elephants they acquired from the Spanish war—a lot of islands that no other nation would have for four hundred years and never will want for centuries to come. The fifteenth section settles that. It is the first authoritative, legislative, administrative declaration on the subject. "That the term 'territory' as used in this act"—before I go any further, what does it mean as used in this bill? One of the divisions of the United States, treated as a State in every respect, the only difference is one has not been admitted to statehood and the other has, but in all other respects it is a political division of the recorded domain and official operation of the United States. "That the term 'territory' as used in this act shall include the insular possessions of the United States." That settles the question. But if they are right about it, instead of being a pure-food law they will find it to rise to curse them in the shape of a very impure piece of legislation which, to be consistent, will require them to ask for a Delegate from the Territories in the Philippine Islands and the other possessions just as in the Territories mentioned in the United States.

Now, I want to allude to the credit system in this bill. That is another beauty. The original bill gives a credit of twelve months. And they say it shall go into force and effect at once, and yet no penalty shall be visited until twelve months. It is in force, but how? Who is enforcing it? It amounts to nothing. You can not punish anybody. Like all people who leave the beaten track and get lost, the more you flounder and wander the more you are lost, and seeing the utter incongruity of the section they attempted to remedy it by offering a committee amendment, and, bless your soul, how do they improve it? They provide by an amendment which they are going to offer that as to adulteration there shall not be any credit. The fellow who is adulterating they punished at once, but they extend the bonded period to the people who misbrand and do what my friend so eloquently was complaining of, send it off and swindle their neighbors. For eighteen months after the bill passes the constituents of my New York friend could make and send to Georgia and Mississippi misbranded swindling stuff without punishment. It is more ridiculous than it was before; the section is without proper reason, in my judgment.

Well, there are one or two other sections I want to call attention to, but time will not permit. I want to talk about the celebrated drug section, but I talked about that before. They require everything compounded of alcohol or poisonous drugs—opium, morphine, and others—to be plainly labeled. But they got up a fight between the doctors and the druggists and they seesawed, whipsawed, up and down, right and left, day in and day out, week in and week out, and changed and changed and changed it until they finally got it so that druggists could put 2 grains of opium or a quarter of a grain of morphine in a fluid ounce or in a solid ounce and sell it, or put alcohol enough in it to dissolve any ingredients, even resin, which requires 100 per cent of alcohol, enough to make drunkards by the wholesale. The committee have gotten ashamed of that, and they have stricken out all except alcohol and now propose to let them brand everything except alcohol. You can put a piece of rosin in the bottle, say that it requires 100 per cent of alcohol, and dissolve it, and you can make all the alcohol drunkards you want all over the country, although you can not so freely make morphine and opium drunkards. They propose for Congress to go down into the middle of the State and talk about whether you should sell a man a quarter of a yard, or an infinitesimal quantity less, and say that it is necessary to invoke the great power of the great Republic of the United States to teach the people in the community all these little matters of private and everyday dealings and concern among themselves. It is ridiculous.

The argument of reductio ad absurdum ought to knock it out of the consideration of this House. Now, the committee amendment so amends that, and provides and provides and provides, until they have provided it into a new provision, that this new tribunal, erected over here by the mandate of this House, in this act, if it is ever done at all, may fix up according to the custom of the trade a certain package that all these fellows may use and get around the weights and measures entirely. Bless your soul, would not that be certainty with a whiz?

The only other section that I propose to notice is what they call the "whisky section." Whisky is bad enough at its best. It is an old saying that "Though you get the best of booze, booze will get the best of you." Folks use it for various purposes and various reasons, and in this free country no law will ever successfully prevent it. If it is going to be used it ought to be as good as it can be made.

I remember the time when it was denied that Congress ought to fool with it. When they set up the internal-revenue system, every Democratic legislature in the United States memorialized Congress at every session to repeal it on account of its character. But now it is found that under the revenue system they do not look after all the imperfections and impurities that rectifiers may produce; and this bill attempted to correct rectifiers. Let me show you how they manage to let them knock it out in that section. They came in and put the language in which says that they shall not blend, except by blending articles of a similar character and purity, which meant two whiskies of different age, but they got these words slipped in, "not excluding harmless coloring matter or flavoring extracts," which experts tell me may be available to help dishonest rectifiers, if there are any such, to manufacture any amount of deceptive liquors, with nothing in them beneficial, even if not deleterious. If they put nothing but water into it, it may be that more water and less whisky will be better for the consumer; but when they propose to sell whisky of a certain character, they ought not to be permitted, under the guise of a pure-food law, by these words being put in it, to use flavoring extracts and coloring matter and to make quarts and gallons of liquor out of only a few ounces of genuine spirits. Even the bill that makes so much pretense about pure food and honesty is sadly lacking in all the essential particulars, and the most impure thing about it, the vilest thing about it, the wickedest and most criminal thing about it, is that it seeks to encroach upon the liberties of the people in violation of the Constitution, which guarantees the just, fair, and equal protection of all the States and citizens of this great Republic by allowing them, under the reserved rights, to govern themselves.

How much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used fifty-four minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think it is right and proper for me at the beginning of my remarks to congratulate the friends of pure food in this body, as well as throughout the country, for the decided and manifest progress that Congress has made in the last eight years in the identification of food and drink.

I refer to the acts called the "filled-cheese" act, to the "mixed-flour" act, to the "bottled-in-bond" act, to the "mixed-flour" law. I also refer to the provisions of the agricultural bill excluding and prohibiting misbranded products from foreign countries entering our ports, and to the oleomargarine law, where Congress resorted to its extraordinary power of taxation without the expectation of revenue in order to break down "imitation butter." All of these acts are certainly in line with a pure-food bill. We are now approaching the consummation of our labors—the enactment of a national pure-food law. I am led to believe, Mr. Chairman, that the majority of the Members of this House are in favor of pure-food legislation. I judge that simply from the favorable action taken by the Fifty-seventh Congress as well as the Fifty-eighth Congress on that subject. And now, the Senate having for the first time passed such a bill, we should act promptly.

I do not mean to be understood, Mr. Chairman, by that remark, as saying that all of the friends of pure food are agreed upon the scope or the character of this measure. I know that there are gentlemen on this floor who are really and truly the friends of pure food who would like to have this bill amended in some respects. Indeed, it is the part of frankness on my part to say that while I have stood unfalteringly in the Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Congresses and now for the doctrine of pure-food legislation, yet there is a feature in this bill to which I do not agree and to which I will hereafter call attention, that I have reserved the right to criticise and comment on. It is unworthy and unwarranted to say that anyone on the floor of this House, for or against this bill, is actuated by any other than worthy and patriotic motives.

Pure-food legislation, Mr. Chairman, is a very difficult subject to handle, as we have found out in our strenuous labors in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the past six months. It embraces and relates to such a great variety of the foods and drinks of the people that it is very difficult to establish any rule upon that subject that does not apparently seriously interfere with special interests. Why, you take, Mr. Chairman, for instance, the canning interests, which I incidentally refer to—a very great and very important interest throughout this country, and an industry that we desire to uphold—and they contend, and contend with a great deal of earnestness and sincerity, that we ought not to compel them to put upon their cans the weight that is in there or other identification. Why? They say, among many other things, because the product evaporates and is variable. They say you lay yourself under the charge of the officer and liable to a prosecution in a Federal court because the contents have diminished by one process or another. Why, the answer to that, Mr. Chairman, is that there are different grades of the product that are put up in these cans; one, the first gathering of the snaps and other vegetables, is the better grade; the second is somewhat inferior; and the third is the lowest grade of any of them; but the manufacturer sells the first and last grade to the purchaser at the same price. Now, why is it that we can not under these circumstances hold them not to sell the inferior products at the same price of the first grade? To do otherwise is to encourage a fraud. Why can not they separate these different grades and sell the first as being the first, the second as the next best, and the third as the most inferior? What objection has a man to such a proposition as that? I would say that in considering the object and purpose of this bill, we must not forget that simply wholesomeness is not all we are looking after. While this is important, it is not all.

While that is one of the objects and ends of the bill, yet there is another and a more important one, in my judgment, than that. It is that when a man offers to sell a commodity that he ought to be required to state what is in it. Does such a requirement hurt an honest manufacturer or dealer—have him tell what he offers for sale? If he is going to sell me a keg of New Orleans molasses, and three-fourths of it is glucose, he ought to be required to state it on the label on the barrel or on the jug. Why should we encourage him to perpetrate a falsehood? Why should the purchaser be deceived and imposed on? Is that right? Is it honest to act under a false representation and deceive the purchaser? I tell you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is only the man, in my judgment, after an experience of years on this committee, who looks to his own personal gain and advantage over the seller who is unwilling to label his goods and say just exactly what they are. That is the honest man.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will my colleague permit me to ask him this question? Does this bill provide that all goods shipped as interstate food shall be labeled so as to state what are the contents of the packages?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It must state the contents.

Mr. Chairman, I briefly refer to the minority report; and I take occasion to say here, after having heard this discussion of States rights, that, according to my teaching, the man who has studied the true principles and theories of our republican form of government can never deny honor and respect for the rights of the States. I say that is my general view. For myself I am a strict adherent of States rights as defined by the Constitution or reserved by the States. No pure-food bill that this House has ever passed, coming as it did from the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, has ever failed to provide explicitly and as plainly as the English language is susceptible of being written that it does not intend to nor does not interfere with the rights of the States. Under our Constitution this can not be done. I have almost, Mr. Chairman, despaired, after so many efforts we have made in the Interstate Commerce Committee, to convince my friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] that while the State has its rights that no one wishes to disturb the Federal Government has also its rights and prerogatives. It looks like he will persistently insist on his untenable views, however honest and sincere he is in the same.

Mr. GARRETT. Do you mean that the present bill does not interfere with the States?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do.

Mr. GARRETT. I am very much interested in that question, and I would like to call your attention to section 12, I think it is.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Section 12 is the one.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, there can not be a pure-food law without power to have standards. Our observation in life has led us to observe that it will be very hard to determine as to what shall be the standard. Now, suppose under this bill the department which you provide shall establish one standard, and suppose your State or my State passes a pure-food law and establishes another standard——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It does not interfere with the several rights of the State at all.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, this bill reported by your committee says that no package which meets the requirements of that act, and therefore the requirements of the standard of purity that is to be established by that act, shall be interfered with by the State so long as it is in the original package. Now, a can of oysters, or a can of beans, or a jug of molasses, or anything of that kind, is in the original package after it gets into the hands of the retail man, and until it gets into the kitchen of the consumer, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. GARRETT. Now, is there not room for a conflict between the powers of the State and the powers of the Federal Government?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, you can not make any law which does not give room for conflict. That can not be accomplished. This section 12 says plainly that "this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State." How do you answer that?

Mr. GARRETT. I will not take the gentleman's time——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me these gentlemen who are discussing the question of States rights lose sight of the great aim and object that this bill has of inducing the States to cooperate with the Federal Government, or inducing the Federal Government to cooperate with the States, in order to destroy an evil that the States have been unable to conquer. That is the whole theory of the bill and the whole case. Does the decision which has been read by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], contain any prohibition of that doctrine? The Constitution can not be construed by the strictest advocate of States as not possessing the power to cooperate with the States in suppressing an evil that the State can not control.

Why, Mr. Chairman, it is simply amusing to hear all the theories that have been advanced here this morning about interfering with the culinary department, about interfering with the cook and the good housewife in what she will put upon her table. Is that argument to be applied to this great bill—a bill, Mr. Chairman, so momentous to all our people?

Why, there was a gentleman before our committee, an intelligent man, a large dealer in canned goods, and so forth, and I asked him this question:

> Is it not a fact that standards created by different States with respect to the sale of goods can not be effectually enforced?
> Mr. WILLIAMS. Not without a lot of embarrassment of this kind.

What was the embarrassment? He was sending his goods into three great States of the North, and he was required to put certain labels on them that were adapted to the laws of each State. Each food commissioner gave the same label a different construction, and he had to label them according to the laws of each State, and it resulted in all kinds of trouble and embarrassment to his business. This law intends to invite the States, when Doctor Wiley and his associates, composed of our ablest men, agree upon a standard, to induce them, not to force or compel them, but for their own public good and their interest and the interest of the trade, to invite them to adopt the same standard. Does anyone pretend to say that in doing that we are ignoring or disregarding the laws of the States or the police regulations of the States? Why, it is the most sacred province of this Government to come to the aid of the States when they are unable to enforce effectively laws that relate to health, such as laws relating to food and drink. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that some of my southern brothers disagree with me, yet I am a sincere believer that the Constitution properly construed can come to the relief of the States when the States are unable to protect the people thereof.

Now, Mr. Chairman, look at this minority report. I am amazed that my good and distinguished friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] should have ever put his name to a declaration contained in this minority report. He says:

> One of the purposes of the bill is to enable the manufacturers of food and dealers in food to disregard and violate the laws of the various States on the subject of pure food, and that has been one of the chief influences that have been advocating the enactment of this bill into law.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I say, with all respect to my distinguished friend, there is not a shade of that kind of spirit that has ever entered into the consideration of this bill. He is mistaken. We have sought in this bill to make it simply an interstate bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the latter part of section 12, which was the last thing I read while on the floor, where it is expressly provided that after a package has reached the State it shall not be interfered with by the State authorities. It is true it is absolutely void, but yet it is an attempt to meddle with State affairs.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this provision has been fully explained—the right of the Government to inspect before a product leaves the State for a destination outside of the State—but I will say that no fair construction of this bill makes any interference with the police or other rights of the States.

Mr. GARRETT. Would my friend mind stating his construction of this language? Let me put a concrete case: Suppose tomatoes are canned in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will answer the gentleman. The qualification was put there partly in relation to theories of the Hepburn-Dolliver bill. I do not believe that a package of whisky ought to be sent into a prohibition section and violate the laws of that prohibition locality. But if a package unlabeled or unmarked is about to be shipped from one State to another in violation of law, does he say that the Federal Government is powerless to prevent such shipment?

Mr. GARRETT. That exception is well put in there. I am talking about the language before that. Let me put this case briefly: Suppose tomatoes are canned in the State of Tennessee and they meet the requirements of law and they are shipped into the State of North Carolina to a retail man. Now, so long as they are on the road to North Carolina—on the way to the retail man—they can not be touched by State law. When they have reached the retail man they are still in the original package. Now, what about the right of the State to take them, supposing they do not meet the standard of the North Carolina law?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In no instance or condition has the State a right to enact an interstate law. That belongs to the Federal Government, and that is the only answer I can give the gentleman, save that your question implies the right for a State to interfere with interstate commerce—that I do not concede.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. HEPBURN], for his own good reason, unknown to me, asked me as a member of his committee to give my special attention to the question of the adulteration or imitation of whisky. Why he asked me that I do not know, unless he meant and believed that I was a temperance man and wanted to do all things in my power to promote temperance; unless he believed that I thought that pure whisky, unadulterated and genuine, guaranteed by the Government as to its purity, would promote temperance as the people of France thought that pure wines would promote it in their nation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman tell us whether there is any existing law that guarantees the purity of whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will with pleasure answer the question. I am going to discuss that question; I know what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] thinks about it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am delighted to know that the gentleman knows my mind, but I am speaking not for myself nor for him, but for the benefit of the House. If the gentleman does not want to yield, all right.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, I will yield to the gentleman without hesitancy.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is it not a fact that the present bottling-in-bond law guarantees simply these facts, the distiller, the place of distillation, the age, the proof, and that $1.10 a gallon has been paid; and that only——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am going to answer that question specifically, but I am not going to do it now. I am going to answer it when I get to it, and I will call the gentleman's attention to it if he is in his seat. The chairman of our committee, as I was saying, might have thought that I was a man peculiarly adapted to peace and order in the walks of life, and that is why he wanted me to discuss "whisky," because he knows and I know that it is the spurious concoction, the adulterated stuff in this country that puts the very devil into men, and which results in murder and the breaking up of happy families. He knew that I had great respect and honor and reverence for the home life that is fostered around the family hearthstone. Yet, Mr. Chairman, you and I and all citizens have seen discord and strife enter these happy abodes and the peace of families disrupted by these drugged and adulterated mixtures miscalled "whisky." Why, I hold here in my hand a paragraph taken from one of the leading papers of the city of New York, which says that wood alcohol, a deadly poison, had been used in whisky and drank at a saloon, and as the result two women and one man were killed.

But I desire, Mr. Chairman, to show the haughty spirit that has characterized the dictatorial bearing and conduct that is visited upon one who asserts the right to oppose the demands of those interested in foisting on the public adulterated and misbranded whisky. I know that I have endeavored since I have been a Member of this House to conduct and demean myself in an orderly, courteous, proper manner.

I never tried to browbeat, run over, or insult a witness in any of our hearings. I hold in my hand a letter which would have justified me, Mr. Chairman, at any moment on the floor of this House, to rise to a question of "personal privilege." But I thought it best to answer it as I am now doing. It is a statement referring to what I said on the floor of the House on this subject on the 7th of May. It was written by one Warwick M. Hough, who styles himself "attorney for the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America."

I shall not, Mr. Chairman, characterize this communication in the manner it deserves, for if I did I would infringe upon the rules of this House, which require me to be respectful when I refer to another person. I have the advantage of the writer. I can speak on the floor of this House, and he has no right to reply to me. While I have sufficient provocation to do this, yet it would be unmanly to avail myself of such advantage. I state that the language that he used, and that I will read to you, was unwarranted, unprovoked, and unbecoming, and revealed the fact that the writer was unacquainted with the ordinary civilities and amenities of life. The conviction that it carried to my mind was that his reckless and intemperate denunciation that the statement which I made previously on the floor of the House, and which he quotes in his letter, was "absolutely and unqualifiedly false" was a convincing evidence of the weakness of his case, and he was arrogantly seeking to bolster it with the manner and tone of an insufferable egotist and ordinary braggart. His conduct denominates him as being an unfit and unsuitable representative of any association. He can not escape the conviction of rudeness by the qualification he attempts to give to the meaning of the word "pure." Such sophistry and word juggling but expose the essential poverty and insincerity of his position. Mr. Hough calls any concoction "whisky" which masquerades under that name, no matter how it is made and what it contains.

I appeal to every member, Republican or Democrat, on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, if Mr. Warwick M. Hough was not allowed as much time to give his views as any other man that appeared in that hearing.

During his statement, as it appears in the printed hearings, commencing at page 96 and ending on page 118, on February 19 and 20, 1906, he was courteously treated and listened to with respect by every member of the committee. I will now read enough of Mr. Huff's letter to enable me to comment intelligently on the same, and I ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent that the full letter and the answer to the same by Mr. Edmund W. Taylor, of E. H. Taylor, jr., & Sons, of Frankfort, Ky., be inserted, as a part of my remarks, in the RECORD. These two letters, in my opinion, will give valuable information on this important subject:

ST. LOUIS, May 11, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 7th instant to have made the following statement to the House:

"I desire the House to understand that we had uncontradicted and reliable testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on this one article, that there were 60,000,000 gallons of whisky made in the State of Kentucky annually, and that only 15,000,000 of it was pure. The rest is altogether adulterated."

If there was no categorical and specific denial and contradiction of such a statement before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, it was due to the fact that when I requested an opportunity of replying to what had been said on the whisky question, the opportunity was denied me. If, however, the opening statement which I made on the whisky subject was understood, there was ample therein to refute the statement which you repeat.

For your information, therefore, I will say that such a statement is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, unless the word "pure" is used in a perverted sense and indicating something different from what the public generally understands the meaning of such word to be, and unless the word "whisky" is also used in a perverted sense, as applying to a product which was never entitled to be called "whisky" during a period of over six hundred years after the term "whisky" originated. As a matter of fact, the article which you refer to as whisky under the 15,000,000 classification is an article which is not fit to be given to a stevedore—it is neither whisky, in the strict meaning of that term, nor is it pure—and if it ever becomes fit to drink or ever becomes entitled to be called "whisky," it is due solely to a subsequent process to which it may be subjected after distillation, which has the effect of purifying and refining the article, and adding thereto coloring and flavoring; but no matter what the process to which it may be subjected after distillation, if it does not accomplish rectification and purification, and if it does not result in the addition of both coloring and flavoring, it not only is not pure, but it is not whisky in the correct meaning of the term. That which you refer to under the classification of 60,000,000 is real whisky, and while the degree of purity varies in whisky, the statistics show that it is not only more pure, if I may use such an expression, but more wholesome than the article which you refer to as pure whisky, which no intelligent physician would ever prescribe to an invalid.

It will be seen that he asserts that the opportunity of replying to what had been said about whisky was denied him. The record, as I have referred to, overthrows that statement. "False in one thing, false in all" is an underlying principle of ethics and law. The statement he assails was found on the following colloquy, page 182, of hearings before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of the House:

Mr. RICHARDSON. What is the average sale of whisky in Kentucky; I mean all kinds?
Mr. TAYLOR. All kinds?
Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; all kinds.
Mr. TAYLOR. It is estimated at about 60,000,000 gallons a year.
Mr. RICHARDSON. How much of that is real whisky?
Mr. TAYLOR. I suppose there is about 15,000,000 gallons of it which is real whisky.
Mr. RICHARDSON. And the balance is spurious?
Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, sir.

Mr. Hough, with the same self-satisfied "know-all" air that he assumed before the committee, declares that the article that I referred to, 15,000,000 gallons, was "not fit to be given to a stevedore," because he says it is "neither whisky" nor "is it pure." Let us test the accuracy of his boasted knowledge as to his definition of "whisky." Dr. Joseph Y. Remington, the president of the Pharmacopœia of the United States of America, whose letter I will read, says plainly that the article called "whisky" and made out of "neutral spirits" is not whisky, and is not so recognized as whisky by the Pharmacopœia. There is no denial that the whisky Mr. Hough defends is made of "neutral spirits" and is not whisky, but is a mixture of straight whisky with pure alcohol diluted to a proof suitable for drinking, with what the rectifier chooses to fictitiously age, flavor, color it and give it smoothness, and then label as he pleases, and he always pleases to call it "pure whisky." I wrote to Doctor Remington, and I read my letter and his reply:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1906.

Dr. JOSEPH P. REMINGTON,
Revision Committee, United States Pharmacopœia,
Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: On page 418 of the last revised edition of the United States Pharmacopœia, which I understand was revised by your committee, and has been the official edition since September 1, 1905, I find the definition of "whisky" officially set forth.

Will you kindly advise me if I am correct in construing the terms of this official definition of "whisky" to positively exclude the recognition by the Pharmacopœia of "neutral spirits" as whisky?

I have taken it that I was correct in my understanding that this definition does not recognize "neutral spirits" as whisky, but I would appreciate your reply.

Yours, respectfully, WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

PHARMACOPŒIA OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Philadelphia, Pa., June 18, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of June 9, I would state that you are correct in construing the terms of the official definition of whisky to exclude the recognition by the Pharmacopœia of "neutral spirits" as whisky. This is not the first that I have heard of this proposition, but neutral spirits is a thoroughly understood product, and it can not be said to be whisky. There are tests in the United States Pharmacopœia description which would exclude neutral spirits.

Very truly, yours, JOSEPH P. REMINGTON.

Doctor Wiley, the distinguished gentleman at the head of the Chemical Bureau of the Government, in our hearings, on page 331, said:

Mr. BARTLETT. That bottle there is Overholt whisky. That is straight whisky?

Doctor WILEY. That is straight whisky, and when you buy that you know what you are getting. You are getting a certain quantity and a certain strength, made at a certain date. That was made in 1896, ten years ago, and the date it was bottled is given there.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What, in short, is it that you think ought to go into the bill on that subject?

Doctor WILEY. I think the bill as it passed the Senate is a very good bill on that subject. I have always told Mr. Hough that, as far as I am concerned, if their people would put on their bottles the fact that it was a mixture or compounded article I would be satisfied.

What fair and logical reason exists for not following Doctor Wiley's suggestion as to what should be put on the bottles? Is the Government of the United States expected to condone a palpable fraud in the false branding and adulterating whisky? That is what the proposition is reduced to. No honest and fair dealer is hurt under this bill who sells his goods labeled and branded truthfully.

This eminent scientist, the head of the committee Pharmacopœia that fixes the standards of pure foods, says the article called whisky by Mr. Hough "can not be said to be whisky."

Before going any further, I will now answer my distinguished friend the gentleman from Louisville, Ky. [Mr. SHERLEY], the question that he propounded to me. What evidence is there that there is any guaranty of pure whisky in the bottled-in-bond? I went back, Mr. Chairman, to the origin of this question. I went back to the report from the Committee on Ways and Means submitted with the bill H. R. 8582 on May 2, 1896—a committee of able men. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask that this report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 1595, Fifty-fourth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 8582) entitled "A bill to allow the bottling of distilled spirits in bond," having carefully considered the same, report it back to the House with the recommendation that it pass when amended as follows:

Substitute the word "or" for the word "nor" at the close of line 8 on page 2.

Strike out the word "of" and the word "thereof" in line 13 of page 3.

Strike out the comma after the word "discretion" in lines 6 and 7 on page 4.

Add the following section, to wit:

"SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt spirits bottled under the provisions of this act from the operations of chapter 728 of the public laws of the Fifty-first Congress, approved August 8, 1890."

The bill as amended has the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, who have carefully scrutinized its provisions.

The obvious purpose of the measure is to allow the bottling of spirits under such circumstances and supervision as will give assurances to all purchasers of the purity of the article purchased, and the machinery devised for accomplishing this makes it apparent that this object will certainly be accomplished.

The interests of the Government and the revenue are carefully guarded, so that there will be no expense or loss to either.

The passage of the bill will enable American producers to supply a very large home and foreign demand which is now supplied, greatly to the injury of the home manufacturer, by Canadian producers, so that persons who desire to purchase bottled goods under a stamp must get the Canadian instead of the American article, and instead of having the option to obtain either.

We are not permitted to export to Canada in packages of less than 100 imperial gallons (equal to 120 of our gallons), while we permit the importation of bottled Canadian spirits, thus putting our manufacturers at a great disadvantage, especially as the bottled spirits thus imported are supposed to be guaranteed by the Government label and stamp, placed thereon under a law somewhat similar to the pending measure.

It is believed that the enactment of the bill will give our home producers a large market for their goods which is now given to Canadian or other foreign spirits.

These considerations lead the committee to recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Now I shall ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] what he has to say to that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman this question: First, is there one line upon the statute books to-day that requires any inspection as to the quality of the particular grain, whether it be corn, rye, malt, barley, or any other grain that is used?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will show me that there is a line as to the quality, not the quantity, I will agree to vote with him for this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I say that the great Government of the United States, by inspectors, follows that bottled-in-bond whisky from the time the grain is ground until it is aged and put in bottle, and puts a green stamp on that bonded whisky. It guarantees exactly the quantity. He knows the alcoholic strength; it is bound to be 50 per cent alcohol 100 proof. You know who made it and when, and it is free from added adulterations under the law.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will ask the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It goes under the inspection of its officers from the time it leaves the distillery and during the time it stays in the bonded warehouse, for four years, it is under lock and key and the key in the pocket of a Government official, and then when it is taken out of the warehouse it goes under the guidance and control of an inspector who sees every bottle of it filled and sees the green stamp put upon it. What other guaranty is required or could be given? Why, does not the gentleman know—and he ought to know, and I think he does know—that when you take the ethyl alcohol, with its secondary products, carry it into the charred barrel of the bonded warehouse, and it stays there four years before it comes out with a dark amber color and an age that the people on the other side—the blended—try to imitate, it carries with it into the charred barrel the ethyl alcohol and the secondary products; nothing is added to or taken from it?

Mr. SHERLEY. Can the gentleman state one single line of existing law that requires any inspection of the yeast that goes into the making of whisky, anything in regard to whether the meal is sour or the grain musty or whether the whisky as it runs out and is put into the barrel has been properly distilled or not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the guaranty that the Government has supervision of it is an assurance. These men who made this report had some sense when they said that "Government supervision will give to all purchasers assurance of the purity of the article purchased," etc.

In the Fifty-second Congress, March 1, 1893, the Judiciary Committee by resolution of the House was directed to investigate "whether rectifiers under license granted by the Government adulterate, pollute, or otherwise drug the product produced or distributed by them, and if so adulterated, whether such product when so adulterated is sold and distributed throughout the country to be used as a beverage."

For the special edification and instruction of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] I will read him some few of the conclusions of that Judiciary Committee as reported in House Report 2601:

These compounds are now being extensively made by mixing with new spirits certain oils, ethers, and coloring fluids, now extensively manufactured in the United States. The manipulation and composition of these goods is done by dealers under authority and direction of a license granted to them as rectifiers. The license for that purpose is now used by wholesalers to enable them to "blend" and "compound" goods. (See page 111.)

Again on the same page:

The compound goods which are now forcing the straight product in the market can be produced in a much shorter space of time, therefore at less cost.

And again on the same page:

Neutral or cologne spirits possessing the same strength as whisky and being susceptible to the most delicate flavor and color can easily and with little expense be given the odor and appearance of aged whisky, which may be and no doubt are extensively disposed of in the open market as straight goods.

The committee then said:

The straight goods are unquestionably preferable, and in so far as the Government has the power it should protect the public against the deception that is now being practiced.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know, as a matter of fact, from the time the grain is ground until the whisky is run into the barrel and put into the bonded warehouse the Government's inspection is entirely a revenue inspection, looking to see that $1.10 is paid on each gallon of whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I can not say that I do.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then the gentleman does not know the revenue law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia if he will yield me five minutes more?

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more, because he is a good friend of mine and because he is on the other side, but I shall have to take it away from somebody else.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is very kind in my friend.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question here if the gentleman will permit.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] what inference he desires to be drawn from the questions which he asks. In other words, suppose that straight distilled whisky may sometimes, and even generally—I don't know the facts—be impure, does he believe that the still further polluting of it by blending or otherwise ought to be discouraged?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All right; let him answer. It is true I have but five minutes more.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] will yield me two minutes, so as not to be taken out of your time, I will answer.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the blenders who can not bottle in bond concoct spurious whisky that is made of neutral spirits. Why, the fact is, and I have given the proof here, they take a small quantity of real pure whisky, 6, 7, or 8 years old, and mix with that, under section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, whatever they please—all kinds of coloring and flavoring extracts, prune juice, and oils—and between sunset and sunrise they will bring out what they call "pure Kentucky whisky, 8 years old." I do not say that all rectifiers do this, but it is done, and under section 3244 of the Revised Statutes spurious, imitation, or compound whiskies are allowed.

Mr. RYAN. Will my colleague yield, just for a question on that point?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If you get my time extended, I will.

Mr. RYAN. I will try to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. All right; go on.

Mr. RYAN. I want to ask the gentleman if whisky, whether bottled in bond, straight whisky, or blended whisky, is not colored and flavored? Every article that is sold on the market as whisky, I will ask the gentleman, Is it not colored and flavored?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; but in a different way from which the imitation, spurious, compounded whisky is colored. Straight whisky is colored by age, by the charred barrels, and it has ethyl alcohol in it and all of its secondary products, and they are mellowed down by the lapse of age; and when that is taken out of the warehouse at the end of four years that is what the parties who do not desire labels endeavor to imitate. You know that no flavoring or coloring ingredients are added to the whisky taken from a bottle-in-bond warehouse at the end of four years. The inspector is there and sees that nothing is taken from or added thereto.

Mr. RYAN. If the gentleman will permit. Would it be possible, if they did not have the white-oak barrel and its being charred, for them to get the flavor that they now get in so-called "straight whisky?"

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I fear that I do not fully understand my colleague's question. It is said that the charred barrel gives a better flavor than any other vessel.

Mr. RYAN. There is only one character of barrel you can char, and it is northern white oak; and this produces the color and flavor found in straight whisky; one is put in by the barrel stave, and the other is put in by an individual adding coloring and flavoring ingredients.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Then, as I understand you, the whisky in the charred barrel, whether under the bottle-in-bond law or not, after remaining in that barrel for some time acquires color and flavor, which color and flavor is given to the straight whisky you speak of "by adding coloring and flavoring ingredients." That is certainly imitation whisky if added to it is coloring and flavoring ingredients, which flavor, coloring, and age the genuine, real, pure whisky acquires by staying in a charred barrel for four years.

I think it quite suitable for me to read to you a certain reply found in the hearings before our committee, made by Mr. Hough, as to "aging whisky."

The CHAIRMAN. Does pure ethyl alcohol and water in proportions constitute whisky?

Mr. HOUGH. It does; that is, with the proper flavor. That was the only original whisky. The term whisky has never been properly applied to all of the products of distillation, but it has been applied only to the rectified products—the purified or refined products. The straight distillate was high wine.

The CHAIRMAN. Then that is just as much whisky the moment after it is made as it is ten years after it is made?

Mr. HOUGH. Not a particle of doubt about that, and the Government brands it whisky.

The CHAIRMAN. And it is just as valuable, just as pure, at the age of one day as it is at the age of ten years, except as it may draw something from the receptacle in which it is placed?

Mr. HOUGH. Excepting that and excepting that it may get rid of something which has been left in it.

The CHAIRMAN. How does it get rid of that something that may be left in it?

Mr. HOUGH. By the process of oxidization, evaporation, and aeration.

The CHAIRMAN. What is there in pure ethyl alcohol that it ought to get rid of?

Mr. HOUGH. Nothing in pure ethyl alcohol.

The answer that Mr. Hough gives is the true essence and best analysis of the blender. It takes him no time to give age, color, or flavor. He needs no bottle-in-bond warehouse for his product to stay there for several years to acquire age, flavor, or color. He substitutes all that in a few hours.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has again expired.

Mr. RYAN. I yield five minutes of the time given to me. I ask the gentleman in charge to yield five minutes of the time due me.

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand all that, but I admonish the gentleman from New York not to expect to give away his time and to also use it.

Mr. RYAN. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia, I am entitled to more than the five minutes I have yielded.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] for his kindness.

Mr. RYAN. Will the gentleman answer this: What percentage of the whisky sold in this country is of the bottled-in-bond variety?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But little over 1½ per cent, I think, and that is why the people are so much aroused about it being imitated by the blenders.

Mr. RYAN. Just one more question: What, if anything, is in this bill or the gentleman's proposed amendment that will in any way affect the new straight whisky that is sold in bulk—that is, whisky less than four years old?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The amendment that I propose to offer is not intended to injure an honest dealer or manufacturer. If what you call "straight" whisky is pure and genuine and you are willing to label it just what it is, then that is all right.

Mr. RYAN. Why, the gentleman does not understand me. I am talking about——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If you mean by "straight whisky" whisky not subjected to the bottled-in-bond process, then I do not hesitate to say that if it is labeled and branded as to its contents, when, where, and by whom made, and the quantity, then it would not fall under the condemnation of this bill, for the purchaser would be advised as to what he was buying, and let him buy it if he wants to. You misunderstand me. I am not contending that there is no genuine whisky in this country outside of the bottled-in-bond article. That is not my position.

Mr. RYAN. Just one more question. The gentleman did not understand me again: The bottled-in-bond whisky is straight whisky. Now, all straight whisky that is consumed in this country is not bottled. I ask him what it is proposed to do to protect the people against young straight whisky being sold—whisky that is not 4 years old?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If it is labeled and marked just what it is. If it substantially informs the purchaser what its ingredients are; if it is marked "blended," then state the age of the blends, colorings, and flavor.

Mr. RYAN. If the gentleman had examined the revenue laws, he would know that a barrel containing whisky must be labeled and branded.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; a whisky made in a garret or cellar between sunset and sunrise, with a fraction of real whisky mixed with adulterants, and comes out eight years old the next morning, is whisky that ought to be condemned and ought not to be imposed upon an innocent purchaser as pure whisky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman yield? Water is made of hydrogen and oxygen; whisky is composed of ethyl alcohol or neutral spirits and certain by-products. If to the neutral spirits is added the other elements that go to make whisky, do you not get whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; not in the way the blenders fix it. No. You do not get it. The secondary products are absent and you substitute them by flavorings and colorings that pretend to give age, bead, smoothness, and flavor.

Mr. STANLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. In just a moment. I was informed, and reliably informed, that while there were 60,000,000 gallons of this imitation whisky from the great State of Kentucky, that not more than 10,000,000 gallons of it was taxed by the Federal Government. The Government tax is imposed on the proof gallon and by manipulation the rectifier multiplies the quantity that escapes revenue taxes. I refer to the action of the Kentucky legislature on that subject, and they ought to know something about it, and will do so later on. I will read one or more of the speeches of distinguished senators there that condemned it in the roundest and most emphatic terms and are seeking to drive the spurious imitation whisky trade beyond the borders of their State. I am aware that the question before the Kentucky legislature was one of taxation, but the whole question of spurious or imitation whisky was discussed.

Mr. RYAN. Perhaps they were drinking a little of this whisky that you were talking about and may be excused.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he agrees with me, then, that the words "not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring extracts" ought to be stricken out?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; I emphatically do, for that permits the blender to continue his imitation. I would be very glad indeed to discuss that if I had the time. I made the motion in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that the words the gentleman refers to, "not excluding coloring and flavoring ingredients," should be stricken from this bill.

Mr. RYAN. And the committee did not take that action.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I know that; and I will make a motion before this House at the proper time to have the provisions of this bill as to adulterating and misbranding food apply to whisky, just as they apply to other food products. I have heard no good reason why a discrimination should be made. Understand me, I do not charge that all sections are engaged in the business of imposing a spurious whisky on the public, but the door is open to do that.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is the gentleman supporting the committee bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. While I am truly an advocate of a pure-food bill, I am unable to get everything in the bill that I want. I intend to support the bill But I have the right to criticise any feature of the bill, and perfect it if I can. I have the right to point out a defect and ask that it be removed. I would not be frank and honest if I did not do it.

I will now briefly refer to the proceedings touching this subject before the general assembly of the State of Kentucky. I do this, Mr. Chairman, simply for the reason that the workings of the advocates of blended whisky is forcibly and truthfully portrayed. I will here refer to the resolution of the Kentucky Distillers' Association, adopted a few days since at the city of Louisville, Ky., and which was forwarded to the House committee of Congress, as follows:

Resolved, That the Kentucky Distillers' Association, comprised, as it is, of bona fide distillers and bottlers in bond, does now, and has always, earnestly favored the pure-food bill and heartily condemns the mislabeling, misbranding, or adulteration of whisky or any other food product. This association is not in sympathy with the alleged efforts of a national organization of wholesalers to defeat the pure-food bill.

This action was taken by the distillers to correct the impression created by certain published items that the Kentucky Distillers' Association was opposed to the pure-food bill.

For better information as to what the real contention in this great question is as to misbranding and adulteration, as to what you offer to the public for sale, I will quote section 3244 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It is:

Any person who rectifies, purifies, or refines distilled spirits or wines by any process other than as provided for on distillery premises, and every wholesale or retail liquor dealer who has in his possession any still or leach tub, or who keeps any other apparatus for the purpose of refining in any manner distilled spirits, and every person who without rectifying, purifying, or refining distilled spirits shall, by mixing such spirits, wine, or other liquor with any materials, manufacture any spurious, imitation, or compound liquors for sale under the name of whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, spirits, cordials, wine bitters, or any other name is to be regarded as a rectifier and as being engaged in the business of rectifying.

It will be observed that by the provisions of this statute that any person "who rectifies, purifies, or refines distilled spirits" is not the person who concocts imitation or spurious spirits, but it is the person who does not rectify, purify, or refine distilled spirits, but who by mixing such spirits with any materials and thereby manufactures any spurious imitation or compound liquor under the name of "whisky" is the man chiefly that the law is after. He has the anomalous authority under the law to concoct a spurious whisky by putting anything in it he pleases, such as wood alcohol or anything else that his cupidity may suggest. What does the term "spurious" mean as used in this statute? It means "not proceeding from the true source or from the source pretended—not genuine—counterfeit—false—adulterated—bastard.

I admit that this is a remarkable statute. The Government, while it protects the distillers who avail themselves of the advantages of the "bottled-in-bond act," yet licenses a rectifier, who needs no distillery or warehouse in his business, and is authorized under a blanket license to set up his business 600 feet from a distillery and by artificial means imitate, corrupt, and adulterate the quality of the pure whisky that the Government has guaranteed and by false label send this spurious article to the public as being "pure whisky." It is a gigantic fraud, and any bill purporting to be a "pure-food bill" will fail in its mission if it does not invoke the strong hand of the law against such hypocrisy and deception.

On the 13th of March the regular session of the Kentucky legislature adjourned. The bill to tax the rectifiers $1.50 per wine gallon for their products had failed of passage. Kentucky taxed her railroads and all other interests, but the products of the blenders substantially escaped State taxation. Governor Beckham, with a courage aided by an irresistible sense of right and justice, within a few hours after the term of the regular session of the legislature adjourned, issued his proclamation for the general assembly to reconvene at once in extra session. It was a brave and commendable act on the part of the governor of Kentucky. I do not hesitate to say that such men as Beckham, LA FOLLETTE, Folk, and Cummins are the men that the people are turning to to protect and uphold their interests. In his proclamation recalling the legislature Governor Beckham said:

A powerful interest present with its astute and capable representatives has been able for a week or more to block all legislation upon the important question of your revenue affairs, and as chief executive I give you this opportunity to determine whether or not this industry shall bear its just proportion of the burden of taxation. Its power has been so great that the whole system of our revenue, the condition of the State treasury, and the welfare of the Commonwealth have been threatened by its opposition to the recent revenue bill.

It was declared in bold words during that extra session that the rectifiers, the blenders, who imitate the genuine Kentucky whisky and prostitute the proud name of the State, are as much counterfeiters and forgers as the men who utter spurious coin or premeditatedly inscribe the name of another on an unauthorized check. It is true that the direct issue before Governor Beckham and the legislature was the levying of a State tax on an escaped and untaxed article.

The governor called the legislature back to levy this tax, and the country rejoices that the victory he won over the rectifiers and blenders was notable and magnificent in its results. It is said that more than one hundred millions of this spurious whisky—blended—are put on the market from some thirty-four States in the Union. The people of Kentucky and other States are being rapidly educated to know what spurious imitation is, as compared with the whisky to which nothing is added and nothing taken from, and they intend to destroy and break down the counterfeiter and his business. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that I can, in my humble efforts, contribute something to this great and beneficent work. I will read to the committee just a few extracts from notable speeches that were made in that extraordinary session of the Kentucky legislature as giving a good evidence of the esteem in which the business of the "rectifier" and "blender" is held in that State. Listen:

"I would be ashamed to go back to my people," said Senator Chinn, as his lifted voice rang through the senate chamber, "and tell them that I had voted against a tax on this counterfeiting business. The rectifiers may be considered reputable business men by some of the senators here, but as for me, I consider that the deception which they are forcing upon the public by labeling their new mixtures, which they can make in a few minutes, as famous old Kentucky whisky, 8 or 10 or 12 years old, puts these gentlemen in the class of the 'bunko steerer,' the 'green-goods men,' and the 'gold-brick' fakir, who are all outlawed by the good people of Kentucky."

The man who sells you a gold brick, gilded like it was gold and which by chemical test shows that it was brass, is put into State prison as soon as the law can get hold of him; but the man who sells you a bogus whisky gets rich on the trick and becomes an influential citizen. If I had my way I would require them to tell the truth about these mixtures they are labeling like real whisky, and stop committing this fraud upon the public.

I want every man, woman, and child in my district to know what these rectifiers are doing. When a woman goes to a drug store for pure whisky for a sick infant, I don't want her to get rectified dope.

Senator Campbell, the orator of the Kentucky senate, flayed the rectifiers, branding them as counterfeiters of the worst type.

Senator Campbell told the senate that the facility with which some rectifiers produce any sort of liquor on a moment's notice had a striking parallel in Goethe's Faust. "The devil," said Senator Campbell, "asked the good people of the village what sort of drink each desired. Some asked for Tokay wine; some asked for champagne; some asked for port; some asked for sherry, and, lo and behold, the devil proceeded to draw all these different beverages from one and the same cask."

This was pretty good work, but the rectifier beats the devil. He can not only draw you brandy, rum, gin, and whisky from the same vat, but he can make them all eight years old for you while you wait.

I now submit, Mr. Chairman, the letters of Mr. Hough and Mr. Taylor, which I consider instructive contributions on this question.

KLEIN & HOUGH,
St. Louis, May 11, 1906.

Hon. WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 7th instant to have made the following statement to the House:

"I desire the House to understand that we had uncontradicted and reliable testimony before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee on this one article that there were 60,000,000 gallons of whisky made in the State of Kentucky annually and that only 15,000,000 of it was pure. The rest is altogether adulterated."

If there was no categorical and specific denial and contradiction of such a statement before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, it was due to the fact that when I requested an opportunity of replying to what had been said on the whisky question the opportunity was denied me.

If, however, the opening statement which I made on the whisky subject was understood, there was ample therein to refute the statement which you repeat.

For your information, therefore, I will say that such a statement is absolutely and unqualifiedly false, unless the word "pure" is used in a perverted sense, and as indicating something different from what the public generally understands the meaning of such word to be, and unless the word "whisky" is also used in a perverted sense, as applying to a product which was never entitled to be called whisky during a period of over six hundred years after the term "whisky" originated.

As a matter of fact, the article which you refer to as whisky under the 15,000,000 classification is an article which is not fit to be given to a stevedore. It is neither whisky in the strict meaning of that term nor is it pure, and if it ever becomes fit to drink or ever becomes entitled to be called whisky it is due solely to a subsequent process to which it may be subjected after distillation, which has the effect of purifying and refining the article, and adding thereto coloring and flavoring; but no matter what the process to which it may be subjected after distillation, if it does not accomplish rectification and purification, and if it does not result in the addition of both coloring and flavoring, it not only is not pure, but it is not whisky in the correct meaning of the term.

That which you refer to under the classification of 60,000,000 is real whisky, and while the degree of purity varies in whisky, the statistics show that it is not only more pure—if I may use such an expression—but more wholesome than the article which you refer to as pure whisky, which no intelligent physician would ever prescribe to an invalid.

Everything which was said derogatory to the so-called "blended" or "rectified" whisky hinged upon a play of words in which terms are used in a different sense than that in which they are commonly understood.

If I should be given authority to establish a definition for flour, I could establish such a definition as would make it apply only to a product made by certain patented machinery, in the light of which it could then truthfully be said that no flour is manufactured, either in the State of Alabama or the State of Minnesota; in consequence of which, if anyone in either of those States, making in the old-fashioned way what has heretofore been regarded as flour, should ship the product into another State, labeled flour, he could be prosecuted under the provisions of a Federal pure-food bill as shipping something not honestly labeled.

Is this the kind of legislation which the country wants or would sanction under the title "Pure food?"

If the so-called "pure-food bill" only incorporated the idea of "honest labeling," it would contain much of merit, and I presume there would not be heard a voice raised in opposition to it.

But when, in addition to the principle of honest labeling, there is incorporated an authority to establish definitions and standards, and the denial of the right to ship from one State to another an article which is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of the bill as it shall be construed by a Department of the Government, in the light of the definitions and standards to be established by it, there is injected into the measure a most objectionable element, offensive alike to our sense of propriety and our theories as to the right of the individuals of each community to determine for themselves what they shall eat and drink.

The bill is not an honest measure, because nothing can be honest which sails under false colors; and under the guise of regulating interstate commerce, the bill undertakes to determine what the people of each State shall eat and drink, irrespective of their own views on the subject, by "preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation" of articles of food and drink which are adulterated or misbranded according to the views of a certain bureau.

How can there be any interstate commerce in something the manufacture, sale, or transportation of which is prohibited or prevented? And how can a person in any State be said to exercise the right of choice if an article which he might choose is prohibited from being shipped to him?

The theory of State rights has been trailed in the dust by the hands of those who should be expected to uphold it; but surely those hands will not upraise the standard of paternalism in its place.

The people of each State should be entitled to determine for themselves what they should eat or drink.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in Gibbons v. Ogden, said:

"It is legislation which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves."

And in the case of Crossman v. Lurman (192 U. S., 197) the same court said:

"If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products."

It has been asserted that the necessity for Federal legislation of this character was due to the fact that the States could not protect themselves against adulterated and misbranded articles in an original package, but on this subject the Supreme Court said in the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., 479):

"And yet it is supposed that the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing that it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought by people in every condition of life are protected by the Constitution in making a sale of it against the will of the State in which it is offered for sale because of the circumstance that it is an original package and has become subject to ordinary traffic. We are unwilling to accept this view."

If it were true that the States were unable to cope with the question by virtue of the original-package theory, there might be some excuse for adopting the Jesuitical maxim that "the end justifies the means," and enacting police regulation under the guise of regulating interstate commerce; but in view of these clear and unequivocal expressions of the highest tribunal in the land, how can any man, North or South, justify his support of a measure in the form of the pending pure-food bill?

Respectfully,

WARWICK M. HOUGH.

FRANKFORT, KY., May 21, 1906.

HON. WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is highly interesting to read the dispassionate opinion of Attorney Hough, of the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America, dated May 11, 1906, to the effect that the rectified and blended Kentucky product is the real Kentucky whisky, in the light of the action of the Kentucky legislature at a special session called by the governor of the Commonwealth on March 14, 1906, for the express purpose of levying a tax upon the rectified or blended so-called "Kentucky whisky," which session closed after one of the most elaborate exposures of the rectifying and blending fraud ever given to the public or made by any legislative body on any commodity of food or drink.

The Kentucky whisky which you represented as appearing in the markets to the extent of about 15,000,000 gallons per annum, already taxed by the State of Kentucky prior to the call of the governor, was exploited in speech after speech as possessing every virtue, whereas the 45,000,000 gallons of the rectified or blended article was denounced in speech after speech as a spurious imitation of the genuine Kentucky product, and on March 26, 1906, this spurious Kentucky whisky was taxed as an adulterated article—the bill so classifying it.

The subject-matter upon which Attorney Hough offers you his dispassionate opinion appears to us, therefore, as res ajudicata.

It is highly entertaining to read the dispassionate opinion of Attorney Hough, of the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America, an association of rectifiers and blenders, on May 11, 1906, to the effect that for six hundred years the rectified and blended product has been exclusively entitled to the name of "whisky," when one of the greatest court cases ever tried in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland on the subject of a food commodity resulted in an opinion by Magistrate Fordham, of the North London police court, on February 26, 1906, by which the integrity of Scotch and Irish whiskies was up-held against the sophistication of the rectifiers and blenders, and it was decided that nothing could be Scotch or Irish whisky to which had been added a single foreign ingredient.

The dispassionate views of Attorney Hough gratuitously conferred upon you on May 11, 1906, therefore, I might suggest, are ex post facto, and I might further suggest that, whatever colorable plausibility similar statements made by him before your committee on February 19, 1906, may have had, they lost that colorable plausibility when, on the 26th of the same month, seven days afterwards, the good news was cabled to this country giving the decision of the London magistrate.

The importance of this Scotch and Irish whisky case is only understood when it is known that the entire trade of the United Kingdom was involved in the issue, and that the specific prosecutions were made merely as a test case, and that the blenders and rectifiers had as their counsel the Hon. Frederick Moulton, perhaps the leading barrister of London, to whom they paid a fee of $50,000 for his unsuccessful effort to prove that the fictitious Irish and Scotch whiskies of the blenders and compounders were the real articles.

In delivering his decision from the bench, Justice Fordham said, among other things:

"The misrepresentation with regard to Irish and Scotch whisky has become very usual, and its adulteration by the addition to it of patent still spirits—neutral spirits—made largely from maize, has been greatly increasing for years, and the result has been taken by the unsuspecting public until the so-called 'blenders' have dared to concoct, place upon the market, and sell to the retailers raw, new patent still spirits with a mere dash of Irish or Scotch whisky in it as 'Irish whisky' or 'Scotch whisky.' The retailer has, in fact, sold this effort of adulteration to the public under the description by which it was sold to him. It is time the fraud upon the public in the matter of the sale of whisky was stopped, and though doubtless these prosecutions are very costly to those who engage in them, the information obtained and published in the course of the hearings of these two summonses is most valuable, and the result of this trial seems to me to afford ample justification for the prosecution. Great blame attaches, in my opinion, to the blenders who supplied Wells and Davidge. I do not think that much moral blame attaches to the defendants themselves, as I believe they trusted to those who sold the articles to them."

It strikes the writer as unfortunate for the argument of Attorney Hough that he should have chosen and elected to use flour in order to illustrate to you the unfairness of the propsed national pure-food legislation.

It is in connection with this commodity of flour that the Federal Government has one of its best precedents for all that it proposes to enact into law through the pending pure-food bill.

Sections 35 to 49, inclusive, of the act of June 13, 1898, entitled "An act to provide ways and means to meet war expenditures, and for other purposes," provides that whenever wheat flour is sophisticated or "blended"—the statutes use the word "blended"—it must be marked, note you, not "blended flour," but "mixed flour," in plain black letters not less than 2 inches in length, together with the true weight of such package, the names of the ingredients composing same, the name of the maker and the packer, etc. (See sec. 36 and sec. 37.)

This mixed-flour law and the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue are set forth in series 7, No. 25, of that Bureau under the title of "Regulations concerning mixed flour under the internal-revenue act approved June 13, 1898."

If the Federal Government will pattern after its action as to flour, now that Attorney Hough has called your attention to it, it will make the blenders, compounders, and rectifiers of spirits mark their spurious imitation with the word "mixed," and it will make them tell upon the labels in letters that he who runs may read every ingredient which they have used in the concoction of the artificial substitutes.

It is interesting to note in reading over the unsuccessful argument of the great attorney, Mr. Frederick Moulton, who lost the test case for the blenders and compounders in the London court, that he presented to the magistrate the same arguments about flour which Mr. Hough has kindly presented to you.

Mr. Moulton did this on December 18, 1905, and on the 6th day of the hearing before the magistrate. Mr. Hough must have been embarrassed for an argument when he had to take one from the unsuccessful speech of the English defender of the rectifiers and blenders across the water.

There is even a greater similarity, however, in the fact that the magistrate of the North London police court could not appreciate the value of the views of the Attorney Moulton, and the Kentucky legislature can not appreciate the value of the views of Attorney Hough as to what constitutes Kentucky whisky.

It is interesting to place in juxtaposition the views of Attorney Hough on Kentucky whisky and the solemn decision of the highest court of the Commonwealth, the Kentucky court of appeals, on the same subject-matter.

Said court, on March 17, 1905, having adjudicated as follows:

"The proof shows that the rectifiers and blenders take a barrel of whisky and draw off a large part of it, filling it up with water, and then adding spirits or other chemicals to make it proof and to give it age, bead, etc. The proof also shows that from 50 to 75 per cent of the whisky sold in the United States is blended whisky. It is a cheaper article and there is a temptation to simulate the more expensive whisky."

In the April term, 1905, the attorney-general of the State of Kentucky filed with the Kentucky court of appeals a brief in behalf of the Commonwealth against the rectifiers and blenders for the collection of the tax levied upon them by an act of March 24, 1904.

While this suit of the Commonwealth involves only the issue as to the constitutionality of the act entirely upon the question of its having originated in the Senate, the attorney-general went into the subject-matter of taxation, and as chief legal defender of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, explained that it was a spurious imitation of the genuine Kentucky whisky.

The attorney-general set forth to the court its own decision in a previous case. He quoted from volume 9, page 616, bottom of right-hand column, of the Twelfth Census of the United States, as follows:

"Most of the distilled liquors consumed as a beverage by the American people pass through rectifying houses. The different classes of rectified spirits range from the cheapest concoctions of neutral spirits and drugs to the simple blending of young and old whisky."

He quoted from the Courier Journal market report of September 28, 1903, as follows:

"A trade publication calls attention to the fact that 8,000 barrels of whisky leave Louisville every week, though much of this is compounded goods made in the rear of rectifying houses or upstairs out of Peoria spirits and drugs and about 20 per cent of pure whisky added to give it flavor."

He stated in his brief to the court of appeals that in the State of Kentucky during the fiscal year ending June 1, 1904, there were in operation, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, 200 distilleries, and during the same period of time there were eighty-one rectifying plants in full operation, and that, due to the fact that there is an enormous profit in the rectifying of whisky, and to the fact that the business is easily operated, it requires no great outlay of money in the building and equipping of a plant, as, on the other hand, is the case with the distilleries.

The attorney-general further says in his brief:

"The rectifier, in a small cellar and with the proper materials, can turn out a greater quantity of whisky in a day than can the distiller in many months of labor. The Federal statutes permit a rectifier to spuriously imitate whisky, but require him to keep at a distance of 600 or more feet from a distillery. A rectifier in Kentucky needs no distillery plant, nor does he need a bonded warehouse, for under the law he can not carry the business on in either.

"As has been stated, give the rectifier a small room, a vat for mixing his spurious imitation, and then by the right given him under section 3244 of the Federal Statutes he brings into Kentucky his neutral spirits from Illinois, oil of bourbon from Ohio, prune juice from New York, bead oil from Massachusetts, and aging oil from Michigan, and with a few drops of real whisky in an incredibly short time he turns out barrel after barrel of his imitation whisky and labels it 'Kentucky whisky, 20 years old,' although the whisky used is not one-fiftieth of the volume of such liquor turned out, and instead of being 20 years old, the age of the mixture may be only a few days."

It appears to this writer that if any Member of the National House of Representatives will read the conclusions of the Committee on the Judiciary, as set forth in its formal report to the House, No. 2601, Fifty-second Congress, he can not fairly remain in ignorance of the status of the rectifier, blender, and compounder, since the investigation covered by this report was made under a resolution approved by the House itself and for the purpose of ascertaining "whether rectifiers, under license granted them by the Government, adulterate, pollute, or otherwise drug the product purchased or distributed by them."

It is interesting to note that the committee disagreed with the opinion of Mr. Warwick M. Hough, and has formally given the National House of Representatives the benefit of its conclusions, after making the investigations imposed upon it by a vote of the House.

Among the important conclusions of the Committee on the Judiciary, as officially reported to the House in the above-mentioned document in 1893, on page 3, are the following:

"These compounds are now extensively made by mixing with the spirits certain oils, ethers, and coloring fluids now extensively manufactured in the United States." "The manipulation of these goods is done by dealers under authority and protection of a license granted to them as rectifiers." "Neutral or cologne spirits possess the same alcoholic strength as whisky, and, being susceptible to the most delicate flavor and color, can easily and with little expense be given the odor and appearance of aged whisky, which may be, and no doubt are, extensively disposed of on the open market as straight goods. With the alcoholic basis, bourbon and rye whisky, cognac brandy, Jamaica rum, gin, cordials, etc., by the use of oils, essences, and coloring mixtures, are produced from the same tank."

On page 4 we find a conclusion of the committee which would seem to embarrass the contention of Mr. Hough entirely.

The committee reports to the House as follows:

"The straight goods are unquestionably preferable, and in so far as the Federal Government has the power it should protect the public against the deception that is now being practiced."

The committee's idea of the significance of the word "pure" and the idea of Attorney Hough seems to differ, with the committee in the majority.

Even the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue testified before this committee that "the making of any spurious imitation was rectifying or blending."

The question of the therapeutic value of genuine whisky to which Mr. Hough refers in connection with the 15,000,000 gallons made in Kentucky was thoroughly discussed before this committee, and Doctor Wiley made the following statement in his testimony:

"I do not consider that any mixture can imitate the straight goods perfectly, and for that reason when used for medicinal purposes it would be better and preferable in every case to have the straight goods."

The same point was insisted upon by the physicians who testified before the North London police court, and their contentions were upheld by the decision of the magistrate above referred to. (See mention of Pharmacopœia further on.) I do not think it a perversion of the word "pure" to say that certain arsenic, free from sophistication, is pure, although in its purity it may be toxic.

I do not think that certain vinegar, free from sophistication, can be denied the title of "pure" because it contains acetic acid—without which it can not exist—because of the fact that acetic acid is toxic.

I do not think it is a perversion of the word "pure" to apply it to a whisky, when such whisky exists in its original integrity, free from sophistication, because that whisky possesses the secondary products which came over in distillation, and without which it would not be whisky.

Doctor Wiley has explained his use of the word "pure" again and again in the press as being properly applied to a natural or genuine article, free from sophistication.

Mr. Hough says in his letter to you that all of the 60,000,000 gallons is pure in a varied degree.

The Kentucky legislature does not agree with him.

The North London police court in its decision as to what constitutes Scotch and Irish whisky does not agree with him.

The Committee on the Judiciary of the House in its report of 1893, above referred to, does not agree with him.

The State chemist of Kentucky, who read an exhaustive paper on the subject of whisky before the International Pure-Food Congress at St. Louis in 1904, does not agree with him.

The State chemist of Minnesota, Dr. Julius Hortvet, upon whom has been perpetrated a bogus interview, does not agree with him, as is shown by Doctor Hortvet's formal description of the rectifier or blender (as he is found in the State of Minnesota) in the tenth biennial report to the governor of Minnesota, under date of 1905, in which he says:

"The well-known quick methods of imparting age to liquors are among the most aggravating forms of sophistication. According to one method, the result is said to be attained by adding 4 to 8 ounces of ammonia water to 40 gallons of spirits, and in the production of rums, whiskies, and brandies an addition of about 1 ounce of a so-called 'raisin essence' to 1 barrel of 40 gallons is claimed to have an aging effect. The manufacturer of compounded liquors asserts that he has discovered the 'rational method.' He characterizes the method of the distiller as 'crude' and 'old fashioned,' and claims for his own products certain advantages as to purity, quality, and delicacy of aroma. Granting all these advantages, as many, in fact, as he may choose to enumerate, the fact can not be overlooked that the manufacturer of spurious liquors has the supreme advantage of being an expert advertiser. His products are all 'old-time favorites;' they bear the names of localities long famed for genuine products, and their labels specify the number of years during which they have been stored for the purpose of aging." (See pp. 433–435.)

The food commissioner of Pennsylvania does not agree with Mr. Hough. On page 24 of his report for the year 1904 appears the following:

"Investigations made demonstrate the fact that so-termed 'pure rye whisky' is almost a myth, as raw alcohol, prune juice, and chemicals constitute the main ingredients of many of the 'compounded' or 'blended' pure rye (?) brands. This mixture may suit some palates, but the purchaser is deceived and pays for what he does not receive. We have need of some stringent laws regulating the sale of alcoholic beverages," etc.

The assistant food commissioner of Illinois, in an address before the international pure-food congress at St. Louis in 1904, said:

"It is stated by authority of the Government that some 80 per cent of all whiskies now on the market in the United States are adulterated, base imitations, and injurious decoctions. Figures from Pennsylvania alone show that 93 per cent of the whisky sold there is what is technically termed 'blended whisky.' This means that for a barrel of 48 gallons some 40 gallons of cologne spirits are used, which has no taste, but has a pernicious effect upon the human system. To this 40 gallons of cologne spirits are added about 4 gallons of straight whisky, 2 gallons of prune juice, 2 gallons of peach juice, and some flavoring extract. The decoction is stirred up, bottled, given a fancy name, and sold for from 75 cents to $2 and even more per bottle."

I regret that Mr. Hough has not seen fit to give some other authority than himself in support of his contention about the word "pure."

Attorney Hough says if his "opening statement" before the committee on the whisky subject was understood you would be set right.

I have referred to the record to find out what his "opening statement" was, and I find it to be as follows:

"I appear as attorney for the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America."

This "opening statement" does, in fact, shed some light.

The light it sheds is augmented by the statement which immediately follows it, said statement being made by Chairman HEPBURN, viz: "We will ask you to stand aside, as we are endeavoring to get facts. We will have lawyers when we need them."

It is noticeable in this record also that the chairman did not even put the attorney for the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association under oath.

But for fear that we might miss something of value of Attorney Hough's contention, let us go a little further into his "opening statement." He says:

(1) "The bill does not apply to all kinds of liquors.

(2) "The term 'whisky' was applied originally to the blended or compound article, and never applied to the straight distillate at any time in the first six hundred years during which the term was a part of the vocabulary of the English language."

If by statement (1) he meant to convey the idea that the bill as it stood drafted at the time did not embarrass the pure whisky of the legitimate distiller when the bill required same to be deemed adulterated, "if any substance has been mixed and packed with it, so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength," and he considered that the pure whisky of the distiller was not affected thereby, he paid that product the compliment of saying that it had not been mixed and packed with any substance so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its strength and quality.

When he took the position that it was not embarrassed by the bill when that bill said "that it shall be deemed adulterated if any substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article," and maintained that this requirement did not attach to genuine whisky, he paid it a compliment.

He paid it a compliment again in assuming that no valuable constituent of the article had been wholly or in part abstracted.

He paid it a compliment again when he assumed that it had not been mixed, colored, coated, or stained in a manner whereby damage or inferiority was concealed.

With regard to the word "added," Mr. Hough appeared before the Senate Committee on Manufactures in 1904 and plead with it to strike out the word "added" from the pure-food bill then under discussion.

The Senate committee turned him down.

Senator FORAKER on February 19, 1905, offered an amendment to the Heyburn bill to strike out the word "added."

On page 2690 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, of February 19, 1906, you will find Senator HEYBURN'S statement that "the word 'added,' after very mature consideration by your (the Senate) committee, was adopted, because of the fact that there is to be found in nature's products as she produces them," etc., and his masterful defense of this word "added" in the bill.

You have, of course, noted that when the amendment came to the vote the Senate turned it down by an overwhelming vote and kept the word "added" in the bill, although Senator FORAKER had had the clerk at the desk read a letter from an unknown party at Cleveland, Ohio, setting forth the views of a famous expert as to why the word "added" should come out, said expert being described in the letter as one Warwick M. Hough.

I think the London magistrate has disposed of the issue raised by (2).

I note that Attorney Hough does not question the correctness of your figures, so that the only real question he leaves us to determine is the true character of the 15,000,000 gallons and the true character of the 45,000,000 gallons of Kentucky whisky.

He says that the species represented by your 45,000,000-gallon classification is purer than the species represented by your 15,000,000-gallon classification.

This is one of the nicest illustrations of ipse dixit that the writer has ever noticed before in polemic correspondence.

Against this ipse dixit of Attorney Hough I have now placed for you the Kentucky legislature, the Kentucky court of appeals, the Kentucky attorney-general, and the Kentucky State chemist, and think that I can afford to rest my case.

In my statements before your committee I said:

"If you take the rectifier and discuss with him before any body of men the comparative values or qualities of the output of the distiller and that of the compounder or blender or rectifier, he will tell you in the course of the argument, as Mr. Hough said before the Pure-Food Congress, that the rectified, blended, or compounded article is superior to the distiller's output which has been aged, because this distiller's output which has been aged possesses certain secondary products which are obnoxious and deleterious, and when you say to him, 'Then, in the name of fair play, won't you allow the privilege to be accorded to you to parade the superiority of your product before the public by identifying it in such a way as to distinguish it and free it from any confusion with the output of the distiller, which you decry; won't you accept that privilege?' you will find that there is always a reason why he does not want to do it."

I have met Mr. Hough three times before various bodies. He went before the International Pure-Food Congress, at St. Louis, and made the same argument which he is making to you.

He decried the whisky of the distiller, but notwithstanding his disparagement, that congress unanimously indorsed the bottling-in-bond law.

Now, as Mr. Hough understands it, the pure-food bill will require the compounders and blenders to put out a pure article and notify the public of its virtues.

Mr. Hough tells us that it is going to allow the straight whisky of the distiller to retain the secondary products, which he disparages, and he agrees that it is going to put the compounder and blender on a pedestal where the great Government of the United States will virtually say to the people: "This product has no poison added to it. This product comes to you now sanctioned by the officials of the Government under the operation of the national pure-food bill. This product is not the distillers' product. This product was not made at one of those distilleries and aged in one of those bonded warehouses, having all the secondary products left in it that came over in distillation and were oxidized by age. No! No! It is the synthetic product of a great blender, or a great rectifier, or a great compounder, who has discovered and has long known and practiced the superior methods of producing beverages."

Why should Mr. Hough have placed the bar of inviolate State rights against this blessing to himself, his association, and the American public?

He says the theory of State rights has been trailed in the dust by the hands of those who should be expected to uphold it.

I see in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 7 (page 6629) your language on this particular subject, and in answer to Mr. Hough I will say in a paraphrase of your words:

"I have been taught, Mr. Speaker, just as thoroughly as my friend from the bosom of the rectifiers and blenders, what are the rights of State; I have been taught at the same time that the Federal Government, in the exercise of its lawful and constitutional functions, has some rights also."

The writer could pursue the points raised by Mr. Hough still further, but apprehends that he should not trespass upon your patience at greater length.

There is one point, however, which I shall incidentally make.

On page 21, lines 22, 23, 24, and 25, there is what I consider a vicious amendment in the bill as it came from committee.

While the general clauses of the bill forbid imitation, this amendment on page 21 fully relieves the blenders, compounders, and rectifiers from the operation of those clauses, in that by specifically stating what a blend is it opens up the path for imitation ad infinitum, and exempts this class of imitation from the operation of the bill by describing a blend.

Attorney Hough says in his letter to you that everything which was said derogatory of the so-called "blended" or "rectified" whisky hinged upon a play of words.

I was not conscious of the fact that in my speech before your committee I was playing upon words when I endeavored to explain the difference between the genuine whisky of the distiller and the artificial imitation of the rectifier and blender.

I doubt if Doctor Wiley thought he was playing upon words when he showed your committee how the rectifiers operate.

I do not think that the members of the Kentucky legislature were playing upon words when they called the output of the blender or rectifier a "Kentucky counterfeit;" and I do not think that the magistrate of the North London police court was playing upon words when he said, "The so-called 'blenders' have dared to concoct, place upon the market, and sell to the retailers raw new neutral spirits, with a mere dash of Irish or Scotch whisky in it, as 'Irish whisky' or 'Scotch whisky.'"

I do not think the Judiciary Committee of the House was playing upon words when it concluded that rectifiers adulterate, pollute, and otherwise drug their product.

The United States Pharmacopœia does not even recognize the so-called "whisky" of the compounder, rectifier, or blender. Its definition and standard for whisky exclude the product which Attorney Hough makes whisky by his ipse dixit.

It may interest you to know that in order to reassure myself beyond any possibility of a doubt as to the exact attitude of the revision committee of the Pharmacopœia I addressed a letter to Professor Remington, of Philadelphia, chairman of said committee, and asked him to state in categorical terms whether or not the Pharmacopœia recognized neutral spirits as whisky.

He replied that the Pharmacopœia did not recognize neutral spirits as whisky, and, in fact, did not recognize it at all, because it was simply a neutral product. He called my attention then to the terms of the definition of whisky used by the Pharmacopœia.

These terms, as stated above, rigidly exclude the bogus product defended by Attorney Hough.

With kind regards and high respect,

EDMUND W. TAYLOR.

P. S.—It is interesting to note some of the further language used by the Kentucky court of appeals in its whisky decision of March 17, 1903, viz: "The appellee advertised his whisky extensively, and we think that one reading these advertisements, who is not familiar with the whisky trade, would understand that it was a straight whisky, and without going into the minutæ of the evidence, we deem it sufficient to say that we are satisfied from it that the appellee intentionally labeled and advertised his whisky as he did to pass it off not as blended goods, but as the whisky of appellant, which had attained a very high reputation as pure Kentucky distilled whisky, and that his thus selling his blended whisky was a violation of appellant's rights. Appellee's whisky was a cheaper article and could be sold at prices at which appellant could not afford to sell his whisky. The selling of the cheaper goods under labels and advertisements which to the uninitiated would indicate that it was appellant's whisky, so well advertised as a first-class article, can not be sanctioned."

The whisky which the Kentucky court of appeals described as the pure Kentucky distilled whisky belonged to the 15,000,000-gallon classification.

The stuff passed off not as blended goods, but advertised and sold as straight whisky, was an excellent sample of the 45,000,000-gallon classification which Attorney Hough champions as the real pure Kentucky article.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, in my anxiety to conclude my remarks and yield to others, I omitted to call attention to an unanswerable reason why this bill should not pass, and that is, that the act for the support of the Agricultural Department is a law which carries all necessary and constitutional provisions. It is repeated in the act that is now certain to become a law. I will ask the Clerk to read to the House from line 7, on page 62, to line 20, on page 64 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The section will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

To investigate the composition, adulteration, false labeling, or false branding of foods, drugs, beverages, condiments, and ingredients of such articles, when deemed by the Secretary of Agriculture advisable, and also the effect of cold storage upon the healthfulness of foods; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of food preservatives, coloring matters, and other substances added to foods, to determine their relation to digestion and to health, and to establish the principles which should guide their use, and to publish the results of such investigations when thought advisable; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries, and to inspect before shipment, when desired by the shippers or owners of these food products, American food products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before said food products are allowed to be sold in the countries mentioned, and for all necessary expenses connected with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in foreign countries. To investigate, in collaboration with the Bureau of Animal Industry, the chemistry of dairy products and of adulterants used therein, and of the adulterated products; to determine the composition of process, renovated, or adulterated and other treated butters, and other chemical studies relating to dairy products, and to make all analyses of samples required for the execution of the law regulating the manufacture of process, renovated, or adulterated butters. To study, in collaboration with the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and agricultural experiment stations, the influence of environment upon the chemical composition of wheat and other cereals, with especial reference to the variation in the content of gluten, and the suitability of barley for brewing and other purposes. To investigate the chemical composition of sugar and starch producing plants in the United States and its possessions, and, in collaboration with the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and agricultural experiment stations, to study the effects of environment upon the chemical composition of sugar and starch producing plants. And the Secretary of Agriculture, whenever he has reason to believe that any articles are being imported from foreign countries which are dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or which shall be falsely labeled or branded either as to their contents or as to the place of their manufacture or production, shall make a request upon the Secretary of the Treasury for samples from original packages of such articles for inspection and analysis, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to open such original packages and deliver specimens to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose mentioned, giving notice to the owner or consignee of the sampling of such articles, who may be present and have the right to introduce testimony before the Secretary of Agriculture, or his representative, either in person or by agent, concerning the suitability of such articles for entry; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee of any such goods which the Secretary of Agriculture reports to him have been inspected and analyzed and found to be dangerous to health or falsely labeled or branded, either as to their contents or as to the place of their manufacture or production, or which are forbidden entry or to be sold, or are restricted in sale in the countries in which they are made or from which they are exported.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed or yielded?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has eighty-one minutes remaining.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in addressing the committee this morning on this bill I do not apprehend that I will change the mind of any gentleman here. I realize the fact that the American people and the Congress of the United States have drifted further this year from the old landmarks than ever heretofore. I recognize the futility at present of discussing abstract questions of State rights, and am not here for that purpose. We have reached that period in our history when the President of the United States says, in a letter to a Member of this body, "I am willing to accept so and so from Congress;" "We are willing for you to do so and so." And Members of this body, who ought to have some independence, abdicate their functions to the Chief Executive. [Applause.] The fact is freely recognized by me that it is not fashionable to discuss the Constitution of the United States in this day and generation, and I am sorry to say that even among some gentlemen on this side of the House that instrument is not as popular as it should be. At every session of Congress we have sent to our desks a copy of the Constitution carefully annotated, construed by the decisions of the court. We have uplifted our hands and sworn to support it. And so far as I am concerned, as long as I am a Member of this body, when it becomes apparent to me that a bill is in flagrant violation of the Constitution, I intend to keep my oath of office as a Representative of the people. [Applause.]

The people have a fashion of coming to the General Government for everything. Soon they will be coming here for uniform laws upon the subject of divorce and marriage, on the subject of suffrage. Shortly they will come here inviting the Federal Government to invade the State of Mississippi and other States and pass uniform suffrage laws because the States will not do so.

Mr. Chairman, I read a very clever editorial yesterday morning in the Washington Post, stating that there was a movement in Kansas to elongate 1 inch the nether extremities of cotton shirts. Now, if under this bill it is constitutional to regulate pure food, it does seem to me that an amendment would be proper and in order providing that cotton shirts going into interstate and foreign commerce shall be extended at least 1 inch at the nether extremity for the health, comfort, and preservation of the people using them would be in order. [Laughter and applause.] Besides, such amendment would serve a double purpose. It would appreciate the price of cotton to the Southern States. It has been said by some one that if the Chinaman would only lengthen his shirt 1 inch, the price of cotton would immediately go up throughout the world. This reasoning is perhaps correct, and such legislation would not be much more ridiculous legislation than that before us.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has the following provision, which is at variance with the fundamental principles of this Government. Sections 10 and 11, on pages 23, 24, and 25, are radically vicious. In those sections it is provided that a Federal official and inspector may go into any manufacturing establishment in any State manufacturing products for shipment to other States and foreign markets, and may demand a sample of the manufacture of that factory; and if it is denied, the Federal Government can prosecute the owner of this factory for failing to furnish the sample. And such person may be fined not exceeding $100 and imprisoned not exceeding one hundred days or both. In addition, the expenses of inspection may be placed upon him. Was ever such monstrous doctrine contained in a bill passed by Congress? In the South we have canning factories everywhere. We have cotton-seed oil mills. We have flouring mills in almost every locality. By the provisions of sections 10 and 11 of this bill a Federal officer is authorized to go into any of these local establishments and demand a sample of their manufacture, and if it is refused the owner may be prosecuted, fined, and imprisoned. And that is not all. The expenses of every inspection at the hands of the Federal Government by further provisions of these two sections may be taxed against the owner of that institution.

Let me for a minute call attention of gentlemen to some of the fundamental principles long since established by judicial decision. Ah, gentlemen in one breath contend for a broad construction of the Federal Constitution, when they wish to pass a high protective tariff or other measures violative of the Constitution; but when the people call for control of railroads, when they demand that Federal judges shall not issue injunctions, that such judges shall not issue temporary restraining orders, you flee to the Constitution as a city of refuge and ask for its protection!

If we are going to regard the Constitution, if we intend to follow the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, we should certainly square our legislation in accordance with the settled law as thoroughly adjudicated. We have a great tribunal to determine and construe these questions. If we are going to follow them, let us pass laws in conformity therewith. If we are not going to respect them, why the necessity of a tribunal to adjudicate constitutional and legal questions?

A Federal officer can go into any local canning factory or cotton-seed oil mill, or flouring mill, or any other local establishment that intends to ship its products to another State or foreign country. Any advocate of this measure is defied to demonstrate that I am not literally correct. Let him speak out. No one answers and denies my proposition. Let us take the sugar trust case decided a few years ago by the Supreme Court.

That decision was right as a matter of law. Take that case, decided in 156 United States, where the American Sugar Refining Company purchased four sugar companies in Philadelphia, and combined them into a trust under one management. They were prosecuted by the United States for forming a trust. Yet when the cause went to the Supreme Court it decided that the four factories being in the city of Philadelphia and in the State of Pennsylvania were subject to the domestic laws of that State, engaged in manufacture and not subject to the laws of Congress; that Congress has no jurisdiction to legislate concerning them until their product became interstate or foreign commerce, although the products of the factories were intended for shipment to other States or foreign countries; that Congress had no power to touch manufacture in any State; that manufacture was not commerce, but "commerce succeeded to manufacture."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield right there for an inquiry?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just one moment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose they sell in that factory a hogshead of sugar to be shipped to Europe.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is actually sold and paid for.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the foreigner is there ready to ship it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Do you contend that the Federal Government has no right to go there and examine that hogshead to see that it is in proper sanitary condition to be shipped and to come in contact with the instruments of Federal and foreign commerce?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I contend that we have power to regulate interstate commerce. We have plenary power in that respect; but until an article becomes interstate commerce it is not subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. Nothing is clearer or more firmly established.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I put a concrete proposition to you. Here it is, sold to the foreigner. He is there ready to cart it out onto the pavement and put it on the ship. Now, has the Federal Government a right to send an agent there to see that that hogshead is in a sanitary condition, so as to avoid smallpox, and things of that sort, in carrying it across the ocean?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The decisions are just as clear and well defined on that proposition as is the intellect of the gentleman from Tennessee. They are perfectly plain. Whenever the article begins its journey as a part of interstate commerce then the jurisdiction of the Federal Government attaches, but not until that moment, not until it starts as interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has it not become an object of Federal commerce? Here is a complete contract, and the man ready to start with it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then it would undoubtedly be subject to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I think so too.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It would be well for us to return to the Constitution occasionally and refer to the decisions of our court. It seems as though there are some gentlemen even on this side of the House who do not care to refer to the opinions of the Supreme Court, and I will admit that there is getting to be a little prejudice against lawyers even on the floor of the House of Representatives. We have drifted far away from the old moorings, and while I realize that I am in a minority in opposing this bill, and perhaps the majority of the people of my State favor a pure-food bill, I shall cast my vote against it, because it not only strikes down States rights, but it demolishes the Constitution of the United States and nullifies every vestige of the decisions on questions we are discussing this morning. Let me commend to the gentleman the language——

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Before the gentleman begins that may I interrupt him?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Just for a moment.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The most difficult feature of the bill to me is this, that the man who violates the law and subjects himself to punishment is the man who does not violate the terms of any act of Congress, but who violates the terms of some rule prescribed by an Executive Department. Now, is not that of itself a pernicious feature?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I was coming to that, and I had a note to make an argument on it.

Mr. Chairman, this bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and the Secretary of the Treasury Department may make rules in regard to this subject and may enforce those rules, and a citizen of any State violating the rules may be tried and punished before a Federal court for violating rules made by this trio of Cabinet officials.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And these rules may be changed by these officers?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course they may all be changed. Here is an opinion, unanimously decided by the Supreme Court, where it held the State of Iowa had the right to prevent a brewery doing business in that State, and not only that, but to tear it down and literally destroy it, although it was making beer to be shipped to foreign countries and to other States. That the Federal Government had not and could not have any jurisdiction to prevent it, although every particle of beer made in the brewery was to go into interstate commerce.

And yet in this bill you provide that a Federal officer may go into a local factory, a little institution in which the citizens and the community may be interested, and demand samples there, levy taxes and inspection fees upon the owners, and they can be punished under the law if they refuse to submit to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. If this bill had nothing else in it except that one provision I should vote against it.

The line is well defined between domestic commerce and foreign commerce, and between the jurisdiction of the Federal and the State governments. Until this year no one in either branch of Congress ever thought of police jurisdiction being lodged in the Federal Government. Never before did anyone contend that the police jurisdiction was not reserved to the respective States when the Constitution was adopted.

Now let me read from this decision, and I commend it to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] and others, for it is directly on the question asked by him. The opinion was delivered by Justice Lamar, that great intellect from the State of Mississippi. He uses this language:

> No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufacture and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. * * * If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures, but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate, more or less clearly, an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest or the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago. The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

And then the learned justice proceeds along those lines, in which he is sustained by other judges, drawing a broad line between commerce and manufacture. It is as clear as the noonday sun in the heavens. It has been reaffirmed in many decisions. Yet this pure-food bill wipes out every vestige of these decisions. It means there shall be no line between manufacture and commerce; that the Federal Government can march across State lines and can seize articles of manufacture. Still the Knight case and others hold to the contrary. But if this were a constitutional measure I would not support it and give it the sanction of my vote. It is bad policy to centralize everything in this Government here; and the policy of this legislation is as odious to me as the constitutional objections. It is not popular to take that stand when everything is not only centralized in the Congress of the United States, but we can say conscientiously and deliberately that practically all governmental power is concentrated in the rough riding President now inhabiting the White House. You have permitted him to ride rough shod over you. Ah, gentlemen, it is time to call a halt. Section 12 of this bill repeals the pure-food laws of every State. It is intended to repeal them, and if you press the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], who preceded me, they will not deny it. Their intention is studied and deliberate. Let me demonstrate it. Section 12 has in it, among other words, this language:

> But food and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another so long as they remain in original unbroken packages.

There you send the original package into the State under the chaperonage of the Federal Government to keep it there under the jurisdiction of that Government until it goes into the hands of the consumer. This section is intended to shield it and prevent the State from touching it until it is sold and in the hands and possession of the consumer.

Why was this language embodied in the section? Because the Supreme Court had decided in the Masachusetts pure-food case (155 U. S.) that manufacturers of Chicago could not ship an original package from Illinois into Massachusetts and sell it to the people of Massachusetts against the laws of that State. The Supreme Court decided that the Massachusetts law under which the agent of the Illinois manufacturer was prosecuted was constitutional, was proper, and the agent could be prosecuted under the pure-food law of the State of Massachusetts; that the original package from Illinois could be excluded from Massachusetts if it was poisonous or fraudulent. The decision was plain, bold, and precise.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Could not Congress have prohibited the transmission of that impure product from Illinois to Massachusetts under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and in that way aided the State of Massachusetts in enforcing her food law?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; because that clause was put in the Constitution not for the purpose of suppressing commerce, but for the benefit and the freedom of commerce. Congress can not put an embargo on commerce. It must be free when legitimate. Questions of murder, larceny, poison, etc., were left to the jurisdiction of the States.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I grant you that, though not entirely; but this is diseased, rotten commerce, poison commerce, and it is not the commerce contemplated by the Constitution. Congress has stopped that sort of commerce and can do it again.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If that sort of commerce has gotten into the State of Tennessee, all I can say is that the people of Tennessee ought to be more watchful and keep it out. It is within their power to exclude it. The jurisdiction of Tennessee is plenary and exclusive on the subject.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And I want to say that we do that, and we have kept out the diseased Texas cattle, but we always welcome her great men.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That may be very true. Then if you have kept out diseased cattle, why can you not also keep out poisonous foods? The gentleman complains of impure foods and yet he has fattened on the diet in Washington, and is conceded to be the strongest, healthiest, and handsomest gentleman on the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Oh, that is simply because the devil can't kill me and I can't be poisoned very easily.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I hope the gentleman may never be killed and may always escape the devil. He never will be killed by impure foods that go into the State of Tennessee if that State is as watchful of its own interests as it ought to be and utilizes its interest, sovereignty, and powers.

Mr. Chairman, I was referring to the Massachusetts case. That was not a unanimous opinion, but was sustained by a unanimous court in the New York "coffee case," in 192 United States Reports. In this case it was held that the State of Massachusetts had plenary, absolute, and exclusive power to punish a person for selling oleomargarine colored as butter in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Is there any decision of the Supreme Court that holds that notwithstanding Congress has the power to regulate commerce, a commodity that Congress permits to become an article of interstate commerce can be prohibited and eliminated from commerce by the legislature of a State?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Why, yes; the books are full of decisions of that sort. If this body should say that poisonous articles could be shipped through the States from one State to another, if they should say that impure foods could be shipped into Massachusetts or Kentucky, the gentleman's State has exclusive power to meet them at the border and destroy them and prevent their entrance within the borders of his State.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Undoubtedly; but is the converse of that proposition true?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not the time now to go into a discussion of that. I am stating the other side of that proposition, which has been thoroughly decided.

Mr. COCKRAN. Does the gentleman contend that the State of New York or the State of Massachusetts could prohibit goods from coming into that State merely because of the fact that it was not satisfied with the general system of inspection established in the State from which the goods came?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Because the State of New York was not satisfied with it?

Mr. COCKRAN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It undoubtedly can, as was decided in that case to which I referred the gentleman this morning, where the coffee was simply colored and did not come up to a certain standard.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman assumes a totally different state of facts from the one that I state. The gentleman quotes a case where the law was sustained because certain coffee on actual inspection did not come up to a certain standard of color. I ask the gentleman whether the State of New York would have the power to prevent any goods coming in from the city of Chicago simply because they came from the city of Chicago and the State of New York was not satisfied with the system of inspection established in the State of Illinois?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It could not, because it has been decided over and often that no State can put an embargo upon legitimate commerce.

Mr. COCKRAN. Exactly. Now let me ask the gentleman one more question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, I must decline to yield. If I had the time I would yield, but I have not the time. Mr. Chairman, I wish I could discuss three other sections in this bill that are just as vicious as the one providing for the inspection of local institutions by Federal officers. Let any gentleman who has sworn to support the Constitution read this bill and analyze it, and he will come to the conclusion that it does go further than any measure this body has ever yet approved.

If we give this power to Congress, we usurp it. We rob the States of their inherent sovereignty. An adjudication of the Supreme Court is worth nothing here to-day. We are throwing law, precedents, and authority to the winds. Still I deliberately flaunt the following language in your face: "In none of the above cases is there to be found a suggestion or intimation that the Constitution of the United States took from the States the power of preventing deception and fraud in the sale within their respective limits of articles in whatever State manufactured, or that that instrument secured to anyone the privilege of committing a wrong against society." Thus spoke the Supreme Court in 1894. It has never departed from that doctrine. Over and over again it has reaffirmed it. In vigorous and unequivocal language did that great court decide that the States had supreme, plenary, and exclusive power to prevent the introduction of poisonous or impure foods into their midst; that such power has not been surrendered, impaired, or abated in the least. This language is plain, and if judicial interpretation is entitled to any sanctity whatever it should be followed.

A little further along the same opinion proceeded: "If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products." The court adds: "Laws of that character are not inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States." In 1903 the Supreme Court quoted and approved the same language, yielding not to the wild clamor and hysteria of the hour. I take my stand with judges who announce this sane, wholesome, and correct doctrine.

It will be developed that the potentiality of the Constitution is not exhausted. That the real sovereignty and rights of the States are not a hollow mockery and sham. There is coming a time in this Republic when the people will return to the constitutional government which the bravery, the wisdom and patriotism of our fathers, who were wiser than we, gave us in the beginning of our glorious history. [Applause.] If we are to overturn that written instrument, disregard it, and say it means nothing but the mere parchment upon which it is written, let us throw it to the four winds of the earth, tear down the temple of justice where it has been sanctified and construed more than a thousand times. And let us tear down the pillars of constitutional government and mock their shallow foresight.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have not lost confidence in this body and the American patriotism that has characterized our glorious past. Our consciences will be quickened and hearts fired with a new glow. In patriotic fervor American freemen will rise up and supplant the constitutional usurper and iconoclast with America's greatest citizen, who now commands the respect, admiration, and love of other peoples as he journeys in their midst. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GROSVENOR having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 18529. An act to authorize the sale of certain lands to the city of Mena, in the county of Polk, in the State of Arkansas.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. R. 68. Joint resolution expressing the sympathy of the people of the United States with the Hebrews on account of the massacres of members of their race in Russia.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, a careful study of the so-called "pure-food bill" now under consideration by the House has convinced me that the proposed legislation is wholesome and ought to be enacted.

The principal grounds of opposition to the bill are clearly and forcibly expressed in the minority report filed by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RUSSELL], and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. The ability and recognized integrity of these gentlemen as Representatives and as lawyers cause me to hesitate before expressing views radically opposed to their opinions. As members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce they have doubtless studied every phase of the proposed legislation, and their opinions, based upon painstaking deliberation, are entitled to receive and will command the respect of their colleagues. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, in the discharge of my duty as a member of this body I am led to the conviction that, however conscientious the conclusions of the gentlemen making this minority report, my duty lies along the path of support to the purposes of this legislation, and, with the deference due their superior learning and great familiarity with the subject, I desire to set forth the grounds of my support of the pending bill.

The contention of those opposed to the bill is that Congress has no power under the commerce clause to enact this measure and that the policy of the proposed legislation is vicious. It is asserted with great earnestness that the passage of this bill is not "regulating commerce" within the meaning of the Federal Constitution; that it is an unwarranted and illegal attempt to exercise police powers belonging to the States by the Federal Government; that these police powers are peculiarly within the reserved powers of the States, and Congress ought not to interfere in their free exercise by the States by attempting, under the guise of regulating commerce, to exercise functions which are peculiarly local. The legislation is not only branded as unconstitutional because it is not "regulating commerce" and is an illegal encroachment upon State authority, but, in the second place, the opponents of this bill assert that

THE POLICY OF SUCH LEGISLATION IS VICIOUS.

That the States have ample power to deal with the subject; that under its police powers each State can prevent the sale within its limits of any article deleterious to its citizens and can, by the right of inspection, investigate and ascertain whether articles of interstate commerce are either adulterated or misbranded; that it is peculiarly within the province of the State to protect its citizens from fraud and misrepresentations; that for Congress, under the authority delegated in the Constitution to attempt to prevent the importation from one State to another of articles which, under arbitrary rules of government inspection, might be deemed prohibited, would be to arouse antagonisms between State and Federal authorities and to occasion needless confusion and countless conflicts between the States and the Federal Government; that, even if Congress has the power under the Constitution to pass such a bill as that now under consideration, it ought not to do so, because there is no real necessity for so doing, and existing evils which are sought to be remedied by the bill may be abolished by other means.

It is perfectly apparent that if Congress has no power to pass the measure the policy of such legislation need not be considered. On the other hand, if it should be determined that the passage of the bill would be constitutional, yet unnecessary, one could not justify himself in supporting the bill.

I am convinced that the proposed legislation is within the province of Congress; that it is not unconstitutional, and that it is wholesome and much-needed legislation. Recent agitation of questions relating to meats and meat food products illustrates the necessity for Federal action in the matter of foods entering interstate and foreign commerce. A misapprehension has arisen among some of my colleagues as to what really are the provisions of the bill with reference to manufacture.

The only provisions relating to manufacture contained in this measure are found in sections 10, 11, and 12. Read them and analyze them for yourselves. Section 10 requires every manufacturer for interstate shipments, etc., to furnish, upon demand and tender of the price, samples of his products for analysis. This, of course, is for the purpose of determining whether the article so manufactured is misbranded or adulterated; for ascertaining whether the article should be recognized as of proper commercial character. Section 11 merely punishes the manufacturer for refusing to comply with this demand for samples and for manufacturing without doing so. He can manufacture all he pleases provided he furnishes the samples. He can manufacture for sale within the State without furnishing the samples; but if he manufactures for shipment and sale to other States than that in which he manufactures he must furnish the sampes or render himself liable to prosecution. The requirement that the manufacturer furnish for inspection samples of his products is a reasonable one. It will facilitate the determination of the issue as to whether his goods are entitled to recognition as articles of interstate commerce. The bill says if he refuses to furnish these samples he should pay a fine. It further says if the manufacturer produces goods for interstate shipment without furnishing these samples he shall pay a fine. Both sections are in aid of procuring the means to determine whether the articles produced are within the terms of this measure. Nowhere in the bill is manufacture forbidden.

Section 12 does not expressly relate to manufacture, but does provide that the act shall not be construed as interfering with commerce wholly internal in any State nor with the exercise of the police power by the several States. It is as follows:

SEC. 12. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States; but foods and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another, so long as they remain in original unbroken packages, except as may be otherwise defined by law or provided by statutes of the United States.

The prevention of the manufacture of articles being a police power, and Congress, as I understand it, having no power under the commerce clause to prevent the manufacture of goods within the States, for the reason that the character of commerce does not attach to an article when it is manufactured with the intent of shipment to another State, but only when it is produced for shipment, as clearly appears from the Knight case (156 U. S.) and the Addyston Pipe case (175 U. S.), this section, construed with all the others, eliminates from my mind any thought that this measure seeks to forbid manufacture. Of course it will affect it incidentally. Many regulations of commerce may do that, just as many police regulations may indirectly affect interstate commerce, as especially when exercised to prevent manufacture; but nowhere in this measure is it provided that manufacture in any State shall be prohibited, nor is it within the province of Congress to so provide. The provisions relating to manufacture are in aid of the investigation to determine the character of the article. The bill only deals with manufactured products as articles of commerce. It has the greatest superiority over some other measures I have examined of a similar character in that particular. Congress certainly has the power to deal with the subject in this way.

The constitutional provision under which Congress seeks to exercise this power is Article I, section 8, clause 3, and provides:

Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

COMMERCE DEFINED BY THE COURTS.

It is difficult to frame a definition that would accurately and fairly express, in a few words, the meaning of the term "commerce" as defined by our courts, but it includes every species of commercial communication between the United States and foreign countries, between the several States of the Union, and with Indian tribes. It is held in many cases to embrace trade or traffic and the interchange of commodities, but it also embraces commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 189; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 447; Groves v. Slaughter, 15 Pet., 449; United States v. Holiday, 3 Wall., 417; Mitchell v. Steelman, 8 Cal., 363; People v. Brooks, 4 Denio., 469; United States v. Bailey, 1 McLean, 234; The Daniel Ball, 10 Wall., 557; Wabash, etc. Rwy. v. Ill., 118 U. S., 573; Leisy v. Harden, 135 U. S., 11.)

It has been repeatedly held that "commerce" does not consist in transportation only, but includes also the contracting for the sale of the articles and their delivery in another State. (Addystone, etc., Co. v. U. S., 175 U. S., 246.)

In Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 447) it was asserted that sale is an ingredient of intercourse.

THE POWER OF CONGRESS "TO REGULATE COMMERCE."

All the cases hold that this power committed to Congress is without limitation, save that prescribed by the Constitution itself.

In Addystone Pipe case (175 U. S., at 228) the Supreme Court said:

The power to regulate interstate commerce is, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts of the nature in question from jurisdiction of that body. Nor is any such limitation contained in that other clause of the Constitution which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. It has been held that the word "liberty" as used in the Constitution was not to be confined to the mere liberty of person, but included, among others, the right to enter into certain classes of contracts for the purpose of enabling the citizen to carry on his business. But it has never been, and in our opinion ought not to be, held that the word included the right of an individual to enter into private contracts upon all subjects, no matter what their nature and wholly irrespective, among other things, of the fact that they would, if performed, result in the regulation of interstate commerce and in the violation of an act of Congress upon that subject. The provision in the Constitution does not, as we believe, exclude Congress from legislating with regard to contracts of the above nature while in the exercise of its constitutional right to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, we think the provision regarding the liberties of the citizens to some extent limited by the commerce clause of the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to regulate interstate commerce comprises the right to enact a law prohibiting the citizen from entering into those private contracts which directly and substantially and not merely indirectly, remotely, incidentally, and collaterally, regulate to a greater or less degree commerce among the States.

We can not so enlarge the scope of the language of the Constitution regarding the liberty of the citizen as to hold that it includes, or that it was intended to include, a right to make a contract which in fact restrained and regulated interstate commerce, notwithstanding Congress, proceeding under the constitutional provision giving to it the power to regulate that commerce, had prohibited such contracts.

In Champion v. Ames (188 U. S., 346), the court said:

The leading case under the commerce clause in the Constitution is Gibbon v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1). Referring to that clause, Chief Justice Marshall said: "The subject to be regulated is 'commerce;' and our Constitution being one of enumeration and not of definition, to ascertain the extent of the power it becomes necessary to study the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellee would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term, applicable to many objects, to one of its significations. Commerce undoubtedly is traffic, but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribed rules for carrying on that intercourse. Commerce among the States can not stop at the external boundary line of each State, but may be introduced into the interior. It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State or between different parts of the same State and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient and is certainly unnecessary. Comprehensive as the word 'among' is, it may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more States than one. The genius and character of the whole Government seems to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, and not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government.

"Again, we now arrive at the inquiry, What is that power? It is the power to regulate—that is, to prescribe the rules by which commerce is to be governed. This power, like all others vested in Congress, is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution. These are expressed in plain terms. If, as has always been understood, the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, the power over commerce with foreign nations and among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions on the exercise of the power as are found in the Constitution of the United States."

That the regulation may sometimes assume the form of prohibition is also illustrated by the cases of diseased cattle transported from one State to another.

Congress, in its power to regulate commerce, may either provide for their being inspected before transportation begins or, in its discretion, may prohibit their being transported from one State to another.

Certainly, if Congress has the power, as the court here asserts, to provide for the inspection of cattle before transportation begins, it also has the power to provide for the inspection of any other article of commerce between the States which, in its judgment, may require inspection, and it also has the right and power to provide reasonable means to enable it to effectually carry out this power of inspection. There can therefore be no objection to the requirement of the manufacturer who proposes to ship from one State to another articles of commerce for sale to assist in facilitating this inspection by furnishing samples of the goods to be inspected before transportation begins, since this is the most convenient way to do it. As to whether he could be compelled to furnish such information in a criminal proceeding brought by the Government authorities against him for shipping articles prohibited under the law is a question I do not here assume to discuss, as it has no intimate relationship with the power of Congress to enact this legislation or its effects on interstate commerce when it has been enacted.

Continuing, in the case of Champion v. Ames (above cited), the court said:

Under this grant of power to Congress, that body, in our judgment, may enact such legislation as shall declare void or prohibit the performance of any contract between individuals or corporations where the natural and direct effect of such contract will be, when carried out, to directly, and not as a mere incident to other and necessary purposes, regulate to any substantial extent interstate commerce. The power to regulate interstate commerce, as stated by Chief Justice Marshall, is full and complete in Congress, and there is no limitation in the grant of the power which excludes private contracts from the jurisdiction of that body.

The court sustained an act of Congress forbidding the transmission of lottery tickets from one State to another, but refused to pass upon the question as to whether Congress might arbitrarily except from commerce among the States any article, however valuable and useful, which it might choose, saying:

It will be time to consider the constitutionality of such legislation when we must do so; but, as often said, the possible abuse of a power is not an argument against its existence.

Quoting further from Chief Justice Marshall, in Gibbon v. Ogden, the court said:

The wisdom and discretion of Congress, their identity with the people, and the influence which their constituents possess at elections, are, in this as in many other instances, the sole restraint upon which they have relied to secure them from its abuse. They are the restraints upon which the people must often rely in all representative government.

This power of Congress "to regulate commerce" embraces every instrument of commerce, as well as the articles carried. (Weldon v. Missouri, 91 U. S., 280; Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania, 171 U. S., 24.)

It also includes the negotiations leading up to interstate commerce. (Addyston Pipe Co. v. United States, 175 U. S., 246; Robbins v. Shelby County Tax District, 170 U. S., 497; Gunn v. White Sewing Machine Co., 57 Ark., 35.)

A STATE CAN NOT REGULATE INTERSTATE COMMERCE UNDER ITS POLICE POWERS.

In Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. (125 U. S., 501) we find the following declarations of law:

What is an article of commerce is determinable by the usages of the commercial world, and does not depend upon the declaration of any State. The State possesses the power to prescribe all such regulations with respect to the possession, use, and sale of property within its limits as may be necessary to protect the health, lives, and morals of its people; and that power may be applied to all kinds of property, even that which in its nature is harmless, but the power of regulation for that purpose is one thing and the power to exclude an article from commerce by a declaration that it shall not thenceforth be the subject of use and sale is another and very different thing. If the State could thus take an article from commerce, its power over interstate commerce would be superior to that of Congress where the Constitution has vested it. The language of Mr. Justice Catron on this subject in the License Cases, quoted in the opinion of the court, is instructive. (5 How., 504, 600.) Speaking of the assumption by the State of power to declare what shall and what shall not be deemed an article of commerce within its limits, and thus to permit the sale of one and prohibit the sale of the other, without reference to congressional power of regulation, one of the learned justices said: "The exclusive State power is made to rest not on the fact of the state or condition of the article, nor that it is property usually passing by sale from hand to hand, but on the declaration found in the State laws and asserted as the State policy, that it shall be excluded from commerce, and by this means the sovereign jurisdiction in the State is attempted to be created in a case where it did not previously exist. If this be the true construction of the constitutional provision, then the paramount power of Congress to regulate commerce is subject to a very material limitation, for it takes from Congress and leaves with the States the power to determine the commodities or articles of property which are the subjects of lawful commerce. Congress may regulate, but the States determine what shall or shall not be regulated. Upon this theory the power to regulate commerce, instead of being paramount over the subject, would become subordinate to the State's police power, for it is obvious that the power to determine the articles which may be the subject of commerce, and thus to circumscribe its scope and operation, is, in effect, the controlling one. The police power would not only be a formidable rival, but, in a struggle, must necessarily triumph over the commercial power, as the power to regulate is dependent upon the power to fix and determine upon the subjects to be regulated."

In Schollenberger v. Pennsylvania (171 U. S., 12) is announced a proposition which seems thoroughly supported by many decisions of our highest court. In that case the court said:

The general rule to be deduced from the decisions of this court is that a lawful article of commerce can not be wholly excluded from importation into a State from another State where it was manufactured or grown. A State has power to regulate the introduction of any article including a food product, so as to insure purity of the article imported, but such police power does not include the total exclusion even of an article of food.

The court further said:

In Minnesota v. Barber (136 U. S., 313) it was held that an inspection law relating to an article of food was not a rightful exercise of the police power of the State if the inspection prescribed were of such a character or if it were burdened with such conditions as would wholly prevent the introduction of the sound article from other States. This was held in relation to the slaughter of animals whose meat was to be sold as food in the State passing the so-called "inspection law." The principle is affirmed in Brimmer v. Rebman (138 U. S., 78) and in Scott v. McDonald (165 U. S., 58, 97).

In Leisy v. Hardin (135 U. S., 100, 125), overruling Peirce v. New Hampshire (5 How., 504), it was said:

Whatever our individual views may be as to the deleterious or dangerous qualities of particular articles, we can not hold that any articles which Congress recognizes as subjects of interstate commerce are not such, or that whatever are thus recognized can be controlled by State laws amounting to regulations while they retain that character, although, at the same time, if directly dangerous in themselves, the State may take appropriate measures to guard against injury before it obtains complete jurisdiction over them. To concede to a State the power to exclude, directly or indirectly, articles so situated without Congressional permission is to concede to a majority of the people of a State represented in the State legislature the power to regulate commercial intercourse between the States by determining what shall be its subjects, when that power was distinctly granted to be exercised by the people of the United States represented in Congress, and its possession by the latter was considered essential to that more perfect union which the Constitution was adopted to create.

Pabst Brewing Company v. Crenshaw (198 U. S., 17), fairly construed, supports the general doctrine that a State can not regulate interstate commerce by means of statutes enacted under its police powers. It expressly reaffirms the general doctrine asserted here except in so far as it had been modified by the Wilson Act, which made fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers, to the same extent as though such liquors has been produced in such State or Territory, and also expressly provided that the same should not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in original packages or otherwise.

Quoting from In re Rahrer (140 U. S., 545), the court said in the Pabst Brewing Company case:

Congress has now spoken and declared that imported liquors or liquids shall, upon arrival in a State, fall within the category of domestic articles of a similar nature.

And further:

No reason is perceived why, if Congress chooses to provide that certain designated subjects of interstate commerce shall be governed by a rule which divests them of that character at an earlier period of time than would otherwise be the case, it is not within its competency to do so.

The Wilson Act was again passed on in Rhodes v. Iowa—

Says the Supreme Court in the Pabst Brewing Company case—

Reiterating the ruling made in the Rahrer case, it was decided that whilst the Wilson Act caused liquors shipped into Iowa from another State to be divested of their character as articles of interstate commerce after their delivery in Iowa to the person to whom consigned, nevertheless the act did not authorize the laws of Iowa to be applied to such merchandise while in transit from another State and before delivery in Iowa.

Vance v. Vandercook (170 U. S., 438) is also quoted in the Pabst Brewing Company case with approval:

Considering the Wilson Act and the previous decisions applying it, it was decided that the South Carolina law, in so far as it took charge in behalf of the State of the sale of liquor within the State and made such sale a source of revenue, was not an interference with interstate commerce. In so far, however, as the State law imposed burdens on the right to ship liquor from another State to a resident of South Carolina, intended for his own use and not for sale within the State, the law was held to be repugnant to the Constitution, because the Wilson Act, whilst it delegated to the State plenary power to regulate the sale of liquors in South Carolina, shipped into the State from other States, did not recognize the right of a State to prevent an individual from ordering liquors from outside of the State of his residence for his own consumption and not for sale.

Quite recently, in American Express Company v. Iowa and Adams Express Company v. Iowa (196 U. S., 133, 147), the construction affixed to the Wilson Act in the previous cases was applied, and the power of the State of Iowa to control the sale of liquors shipped from another State into that State, after their delivery to the consignee, was upheld.

Thus it appears that the rule applied in many cases decided by our highest court, to the effect that the States can not interfere with any article recognized by Congress as being a proper article of interstate commerce, either while in transit or held by the importer for sale in the original package, under its police powers; that Congress by the Wilson Act has made liquors subject to the police powers of the States upon their arrival there, thus divesting them of the character of interstate commerce. Having unlimited control of the subject, as decided in Ogden v. Gibbon and many subsequent cases, Congress can make any regulation it chooses. It can define what articles shall be transported, when the character of interstate commerce shall attach, and when it shall terminate.

Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Railway Company (125 U. S.) held void an Iowa statute imposing a fine upon transportation companies for knowingly bringing into that State any intoxicating liquors without having first been furnished with a certificate, under the seal of the county auditor of the county to which the liquor was to be transported, certifying that the person to whom the same was to be delivered was authorized under the law to sell such liquors in that county. It was regarded as an interference with interstate commerce and not within the State's police power. In this case the court quoted approvingly the definition of police power in Robbins v. Shelby Taxing District (120 U. S., 489), as follows:

It is also an established principle, as already indicated, that the only way in which commerce between the States can be legitimately affected by State laws is when, by virtue of its police powers and its jurisdiction over persons and property within its limits, a State provides for the security of the lives, limbs, health, and comfort of persons and the protection of property, or when it does those things which may otherwise incidentally affect commerce, such as the establishment and regulation of highways, canals, railroads, wharves, ferries, and other commercial facilities; the passage of inspection laws to secure the due quality and measure of products and commodities; the passage of laws to regulate or restrict the sale of articles deemed injurious to the health or morals of the community; the imposition of taxes upon persons residing within the State or belonging to its population, and upon avocations and employments pursued therein not directly connected with foreign or interstate commerce or with some other employment or business exercised under authority of the Constitution and laws of the United States; and the imposition of taxes upon all property within the State mingled with and forming part of the great mass of property therein. But in making such internal regulations a State can not impose taxes upon persons passing through the State or coming into it merely for a temporary purpose, especially if connected with interstate or foreign commerce; nor can it impose such taxes upon property imported into the State from abroad or from another State, and not yet become a part of the common mass of property therein; and no discrimination can be made by any such regulations adversely to the person or property of other States; and no regulation can be made directly affecting interstate commerce. Any taxation or regulation of the latter character would be an unauthorized interference with the power given to Congress over the subject. * * * In a word, it may be said that in the matter of interstate commerce the United States are but one country and are and must be subject to one system of regulation, and not to a multitude of systems. The doctrine of the freedom of that commerce, except as regulated by Congress, is so firmly established that it is unnecessary to enlarge further upon the subject.

In this case the court referred approvingly to the doctrine of Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat., 419), where it was held that the right of importation necessarily implied the right to sell in original packages. Mr. Justice Field, concurring in the majority opinion in the Bowman case, said:

That the right of importation carries with it the right to sell the article imported does not appear to me doubtful.

So in the present case it is perhaps impossible to state any rule which would determine in all cases where the right to sell an imported article under the commercial power of the Federal Government ends and the power of the State to restrict further sale has commenced. Perhaps no safer rule can be adopted than the one laid down in Brown v. Maryland, that the commercial power continues until the articles imported have become mingled with and incorporated into the general property of the State, and not afterwards. And yet it is evident that the value of the importation will be materially affected if the article imported ceases to be under the protection of the commercial power upon its sale by the importer. * * * Thus the absence of regulations as to interstate commerce with reference to any particular subject is taken as a declaration that the importation of that article into the State shall be unrestricted. It is only after the importation is completed and the property imported has mingled with and become a part of the general property of the State that its regulations can act upon it, except so far as may be necessary to insure safety in the disposition of the import until thus mingled.

Mr. Justice Field cited in support of this doctrine the following cases, which from a casual reading appear to support the point: Cooley v. Board of Wardens of the Port of Philadelphia (12 How., 299, 319); State Frt. Tax Case (15 Wall., 232, 271); Weldon v. Missouri (91 U. S., 275, 282); Railroad v. Husen (95 U. S., 465, 469); Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 697); Gloucester Ferry Company v. Pennsylvania (114 U. S., 196, 203); Brown v. Houston (114 U. S., 622, 631); Walling v. Michigan (116 U. S., 446, 455); Pickard v. Pullman So. Car Co. (117 U. S. 34); Wabash, etc., Railway Company v. Illinois (118 U. S., 557); Robbins v. Shelby County Tax District (120 U. S., 489).

It is uniformly held that while an article ceases to be a subject of commerce when importation is complete (People v. Huntington, 4 N. Y. Leg. Obs., 187), yet importation is never complete (except in the case of liquors transported from one State to another under the Wilson Act) so long as the article remains in the importer's hands in the original package. (Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S., 108; Bowman v. Chicago, etc., Ry., 125 U. S., 506; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 442.)

An article loses its character as an article of commerce if the importer so handles it as to mix it with the mass of property in the State. (May v. New Orleans, 178 U. S., 507; Ex parte Brown, 48 Fed., 436; Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 441.)

Crosman v. Lurman (192 U. S., 189) is frequently quoted by those opposed to this bill as authority for the contention that Congress is without power to pass such a measure as that now under consideration under its power to regulate commerce, and also as an authority that the States can by statute fully protect their citizens from impure and adulterated foods and other deleterious articles often the subject of interstate commerce. This was a case where the court found that imported coffee had been "adulterated for the purposes of fraud and deception," and the court sustained a statute of the State of New York forbidding its sale, as not being an interference with commerce. Furthermore, I think that coffee "adulterated for the purposes of fraud and deception" was not a legitimate article of commerce within the meaning of the act of Congress of August 30, 1890, which contained among other provisions the following:

That it shall be unlawful to import into the United States any adulterated or unwholesome food or drug, or any vinous, spirituous, or malt liquors, adulterated or mixed with any poisonous or noxious chemical, drug, or other ingredient injurious to health.

Moreover the State act merely forbade the sale of, or having for sale, any adulterated food or drug. There is not now, nor has there ever been in my mind any question as to the power of the State to forbid the sale of adulterated or fraudulently branded articles for the protection of its citizens from danger of disease and from fraud. These subjects are peculiarly within the province of the States. The fact that the States have the power to enact such legislation in no sense detracts from the power of Congress to deny the instrumentalities and privileges of interstate commerce to articles which, if consumed, might injure the health of the citizens. The State can not do this, for it has nothing to do with interstate commerce. The only influence it can exert upon interstate commerce is that incidental to its police regulations regarding inspection after an article has been imported, and forbidding its sale if deemed deleterious. Nowhere has it been held that Congress is without power to divest an article, adulterated or misbranded, designed for transportation and sale in another State than that in which it was manufactured, of its character as an article of commerce. I am not now discussing the policy of the exercise of this power, but the existence of it, and I say that if, according to the many authorities cited and others which I have not had an opportunity of presenting, Congress has plenary power over interstate commerce, over its instrumentalities, its subjects, and can determine what articles are proper articles of commerce, subject only to the limitations imposed by the Constitution itself, it can certainly deny to an article found to be adulterated or misbranded the right to be transported to another State.

If it has not this power, then what is the power delegated to Congress in the Constitution? What mean the words "to regulate commerce * * * among the States?" If Congress can not prescribe what articles shall be deemed proper articles of commerce, if it can not deny that character to any article adulterated or misbranded, then its "power to regulate commerce" is indeed a limited and useless one. Clearly the line between State and Federal authority in this matter is well drawn, although confusion may arise in attempting to trace it in some instances. The States have power to prescribe all needful rules for the protection of its citizens from frauds and misrepresentations and from injury therefrom by forbidding the manufacture within its own borders and the sale within its limits of any article deleterious to the health of the citizens, and in the matter of articles imported from other States, under its police power, a State may provide for the inspection of all articles imported, and if found unsound, may forbid their sale. But no State can define what articles shall be imported or forbid the importation of any recognized article of commerce, and, except for purposes of inspection, as a general rule, the State can not interfere with any article of interstate commerce while it is in the hands of the importer in the original package unless the importer has mixed it with the general property of the State. No State has any power to regulate interstate commerce. In the exercise of its police powers it may effect the transportation of articles in interstate commerce, but such effect is merely incidental to the right of inspection.

The respective powers of State and of the Congress are in the main independent of each other, and neither can add to nor take therefrom. The decisions sustaining the Wilson Act of 1890 do not proceed upon the theory that Congress has added to the police power of the States by making liquors subject to State laws with reference thereto upon their arrival in the State, but rather on the idea that Congress, in the exercise of its power to regulate commerce, can, since that power is unlimited, save by the Constitution itself, divest an article of interstate commerce of its character as such upon its arrival in a State, and that in doing so Congress does not add to the police power, but merely facilitates and aids it, and in that way regulates commerce. The distinction may not be altogether clear, and it may seem to many, as it sometimes has to me, that if Congress has the power to say that an article of interstate commerce shall be divested of its commercial character immediately upon arriving in another State than that from which it was shipped, that it can also provide that such articles shall be divested of their character from the time they are shipped, and thus totally destroy interstate commerce as such. But perhaps it will be time enough to consider this proposition when it arises. We have here no question of the power of Congress to suspend or destroy interstate commerce or to delegate its powers of regulation and control conferred in the Constitution to State tribunals and police powers. The question here is, Has Congress the power to define, within reasonable limitations, what foods and drugs shall be deemed adulterated and misbranded and to deny the character of interstate commerce to articles which are so adulterated and misbranded? I have no shadow of doubt that Congress has such power, and I find, fairly considered, the theory supported by a long line of decisions from our highest court. Moreover, I have found no case fairly construed that minimizes that doctrine. The line of demarkation between State and Federal authority in such matters is not always easily followed, but it is there, and neither Congress nor the States can make a new line. The power is vested exclusively in Congress to regulate interstate commerce, and this bill seeks to deal with articles of interstate commerce as such. It nowhere interferes with the right of the State to pass any law it desires with reference to the sale of such articles, except that it forbids interference with original packages, and since the States can only interfere with them for purposes of inspection, on the theory that they may be dangerous to the health of its citizens, I see no objection to that feature of the bill, because every article so transported will be recognized as an article of interstate commerce, and the States to which it is imported would have no occasion to interfere with it, except for such purposes as the protection of the lives and health of their citizens, and the power to do this can not be taken from them.

I have carefully examined the principal cases cited by gentlemen opposing this measure, and do not find that they are inconsistent, upon the whole, with the position here sought to be maintained. Some of these cases have already been discussed at length.

Crosman v. Lurman (192 U. S., 189), strongly relied on by opponents of this bill, was a case where a State statute forbade the sale of adulterated food and drugs, and coffee which the court found to be adulterated for purposes of fraud and deception was not permitted to be sold. The Supreme Court held that the Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public and that the statute was within the police powers (p. 198).

Pabst Brewing Company v. Crenshaw (198 U. S., 17) is governed by the Wilson Act of August, 1890, which has several times been upheld. In this case the court sustained the statute of Missouri providing for an inspection of liquors shipped from other States upon their arrival, no discrimination being made between home and foreign manufactured goods. This doctrine of the Wilson Act, making liquors shipped into a State subject to the laws of the State upon their arrival, is sustained by Rahrer's case (140 U. S., 545) and many other cases.

1851.—Fitch v. Livingstone (6 Sandf., 492) involved an action for damages occasioned by a steamboat collision on the Hudson River, based upon a State statute requiring steamboats to carry two signal lights in the usual manner on the river, while the act of Congress on the subject provided: "Every steamboat shall carry at night one or more signal lights." The statute was sustained as not in violation of any act of Congress, implying that such legislation is within the recognized power of the States when not in conflict with any act of Congress.

1837.—City of New York v. Miln (11 Peters, 102). Held valid a New York statute requiring the master of every vessel, within twenty-four hours after arriving, to make a report, in writing, of the names, ages, settlement, etc., of all passengers, as not violating the Constitution; that persons are not the subject of commerce, and neither the clause regulating commerce nor that prohibiting the States from imposing duty on imported goods apply. That portion of the opinion which questioned the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce was never authorized. (7 How., 429.)

1840.—Holmes v. Jennison (14 Pet., 568) was a habeas corpus case, and merely decided that a State court can not surrender to a foreign power a fugitive from justice, but can make punishable within its own courts crimes committed in foreign countries if jurisdiction is obtained of the criminal. (7 How., 427.)

1841.—Groves v. Slaughter (15 Pet., 449, 512) merely decided, after much discussion of many irrelevant points, that a provision in the Mississippi constitution of 1832, providing that after May 1, 1833, the introduction of slaves from other States should be prohibited as merchandise or for sale, was not effective without legislative enactment. Under Article I, section 9, Constitution of the United States, there is implied the right of the States to exclude slaves until Congress should forbid.

1847.—The License cases (5 How., 589, 631) involved the validity of statutes enacted by Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire relating to the sale of liquor. There was no opinion of the court as such (see reporter's statement, p. 504); but each of the judges rendered a personal opinion. The authority of Gibbons v. Ogden and Brown v. Maryland, now universally recognized, was questioned by some of the judges, approved by others, and disputed by others still. While these discussions are illuminating, they can not be regarded as controlling. Long ago the Supreme Court established firmly the doctrine of the exclusive power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, and that the character of commerce is retained by an article imported from another State until sold by the importer in the original package or otherwise commingled with the general property of the State, and the only case which involved the power of the States to regulate commerce within their own limits in the absence of Congressional action (the New Hampshire case) was overruled in Leisy v. Hardin.

1849.—The Passenger cases (7 How., 283) held statutes enacted by the respective legislatures of New York and Massachusetts taxing alien passengers upon their arrival from foreign countries at the ports of these States void. There was no authentic report—that is, the court as such rendered no opinion—but each of the judges expressed his views concerning the subject. Mr. Justice Wayne, in his opinion, firmly declared that so much of the alleged opinion of the court in New York v. Miln (11 Peters, 102) as expressed any doubt that Congress has exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce was never agreed to. He also strongly reaffirmed Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat.) and Brown v. Maryland (12 Wheat.).

Lunt's case (6 Greenl. (Me.), 412) relates to the right of a State legislature to regulate the sale of liquor, no question of interstate commerce whatever being involved. It merely holds that the privilege of selling liquor as a retail dealer is not a constitutional right, and may be licensed by a State.

Conway et al. v. Taylor (1 Blackford, 603) was a ferry case. It holds that a State may grant a valid and exclusive privilege to transit from her own shores, leaving the other States to regulate the same rights on their own sides. It does not directly enlighten any issue in this controversy.

United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 214). This was an election case involving the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution and relating to the power of Congress to legislate concerning elections in the States, and holding that power to be limited to cases where the wrongful refusal to permit one to vote is on account of race or color.

United States v. Cruikshanks (92 U. S., 543) is an election case, in which was at issue the validity of an indictment charging in general terms a conspiracy to deprive a colored citizen of his rights, privileges, and immunities under the Constitution, and to prevent and hinder him in the free exercise thereof on account of his race or color. The court, of course, held that the indictment was indefinite because it did not state what right, etc., was sought to be invaded.

Austin v. Tennessee (179 U. S., 343) held cigarettes to be articles of interstate commerce, and that the importer has the right to sell in original packages without regard to the Tennessee statute, but that this right does not extend to subterfuge original packages.

We next have to consider the propriety of exercising this power of Congress and passing this bill. For, as has often been observed, the power to do a thing and the propriety of doing it are quite different questions, and it may often be well not to exercise a power that plainly exists. The failure to exercise a power of Congress does not rob the national legislative branch of the Government of authority conferred upon it by the Constitution, and Congress possesses many powers that it does not habitually exercise. So it will be well to examine into the question whether the passage of this bill, conceding the power of Congress to enact it, is to be desired.

The policy of this legislation is not vicious, but, on the contrary, it is wholesome. The first consideration that leads me to the conviction that Congress, having the power to do so, should enact this bill or some similar measure, is the failure or inability of the States, in the main, to exercise their police powers to protect their citizens from frauds and injuries occasioned by impure and adulterated foods and drugs, and this failure or their inability to do so, or both, accentuates the necessity for the exercise by Congress of its powers to deny the character of commerce to articles so misbranded or adulterated.

As heretofore shown, the line between State and Federal authority is reasonably distinct. The State, for the protection of the lives and health of its citizens, can forbid the sale of deleterious articles; Congress can forbid their importation, and thus materially aid in protecting the public from the avarice of manufacturers who practice frauds in the introduction and sale of their products. The powers of the State and nation are distinct and independent, and the existence of the one does not question the existence of the other. The legislation enacted by the various States does not indicate organized effort to prevent the imposition of frauds in the sale of food products and drugs. This fact urges upon my mind the consideration whether Congress can rightfully refuse also to act within the scope of its powers. The Government has a power which the States can not exercise. That is the power to regulate commerce, to deny commercial character to fraudulent or misbranded, adulterated, and unwholesome articles. Why and how would the exercise of this power deprive any citizen of any right or any State of any power? The power of the State is separate from the power of the nation. The State can not exercise the national function, which is to regulate commerce between the States. The nation can not lessen the inherent power of every State to preserve peace and health among its citizens. How can it be wrong for Congress to say to manufacturers, "You can not use instrumentalities under our control to rob and oppress the public; you shall not claim protection under the Constitution from the enforcement of any State statute which seeks to prevent fraud and deception; neither will the strong arm of this Government be extended to make heavier the burden of the States in the exercise of their rights and in the discharge of their duties?" The power to regulate commerce gives Congress the right to deny the instrumentalities and benefits of interstate commerce to persons and organizations who, for profit or other purpose, misrepresent their products and thus mislead and defraud the public. How can any honest man who wants to brand his goods object to branding them honestly? Is it claimed that the Constitution was designed to shield fraud and encourage deception?

If one brands his goods falsely, upon what principle can one demand of the Government the use of agencies under its control to assist in perpetrating frauds on innocent purchasers of his goods? The so-called "pure-food laws" of the States are, in the main, failures. I admit that if Congress did not have the power to pass a law forbidding impure foods from being carried as articles of commerce that the failure or inability of the States to do their duty could not create that power. But Congress having such power, the inability or failure of the States to exercise such powers as they possess only makes the duty of Congress to act more imperative. Its action does not create power. That power exists, and has always existed since the Constitution was adopted. The question of whether a power shall be exercised is independent of the existence of such power, for it involves considerations of public policy. As has often been said heretofore, power exists for the protection of the public, and it is not always true that every existing power should be exercised, but when the public is oppressed, defrauded, deceived, robbed, the time has come for the Government, in the exercise of its powers, to do its part in the prevention of such abuses. Why should the Government not exert its agencies to the suppression of the carrying as articles of interstate commerce fraudulent, misbranded, or adulterated articles? It must, indeed, be a peculiar mind that objects to the enactment of legislation on the ground of public policy when that legislation is designed to suppress widespread and long-continued abuses, evils which all decry and none condone.

STATE LEGISLATION ON THE SUBJECT IS VARIED AND INEFFECTIVE.

Alabama, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, and other States have food laws, but there is an almost total lack of uniformity among them, and in most instances no agencies are provided for the enforcement of the statutes that have been enacted, so that the laws in the main are mere dead letters.

Alabama, in her criminal code, has a general statute against the adulteration of foods by merchants or their sale after they have been so adulterated, and other provisions relate to selling unwholesome bread, adulterated butter, confectioneries, and meats, but no machinery is provided for its enforcement, save that the commissioner of agriculture is required to investigate sales of oleomargarine and report violations of the law to prosecuting officers. There seems to be no legislation relative to misbranded or adulterated drugs, and, from the best information obtainable, the statute is rarely enforced.

Arkansas, by act of April, 1893, has provided, with reference to general foods:

Whoever shall knowingly sell or offer or expose for sale, or bring or cause to be brought into this State, or shall have in his or their possession with intent to sell for food, the flesh of any animal dying otherwise than by slaughter, or slaughtered when diseased; or shall sell or offer for sale the flesh as of one animal, knowing it to be of another species, or shall offer for sale or sell any tainted, diseased, corrupted, decayed, or unwholesome meat, fish, fowl, vegetables, produce, or provisions of any kind whatever, without making the same fully known to the purchaser, or shall sell or offer to sell the meat of any calf which was killed before it had attained the age of six weeks, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $500 or by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months.

The following provisions with reference to oleomargarine or butter are found in Kirby's Digest, sections 1702, 1703, 1704, 1705, and 1706:

BUTTER.

Oleomargarine to be labeled and marked.—Whoever shall sell any article, substance, or compound made in imitation or semblance of butter, or as a substitute for butter, and not made exclusively or wholly of milk or cream, or containing any fats, oils, or grease not produced from milk or cream, shall have the words "adulterated butter," or, if such substitute is a compound known as "oleomargarine" or "butterine," or if it is known by any other name, the word "oleomargarine," "butterine," or such other name as shall properly describe it, shall be stamped, labeled, or marked in printed letters of plain roman type not less than 1 inch in length, so that said word or words can not be easily defaced, upon the top and side of every tub, firkin, box, or package containing any of said article, substance, or compound; and in case of retail sales of any of said article, substance, or compound, the seller shall attach, or cause to be attached, to each package so sold at retail, and deliver with said package to the purchaser, a label or wrapper, bearing in a conspicuous place upon the outside of said package the words "adulterated butter," or the word "oleomargarine," "butterine," or such other word or words as will correctly describe the article, substance, or compound sold, as hereinbefore provided, in printed letters of plain roman type not less than one-half inch in length.

Defacing of labels, etc., on butter substitutes; penalty.—Whoever shall sell or expose for sale, or has in his possession with intent to sell, any article, substance, or compound made in imitation or semblance of butter, or as a substitute for butter, except as provided in section 1586, and whoever shall deface, erase, cancel, or remove any mark, stamp, brand, label, or wrapper provided for by this act, or change the contents of any box, tub, article, or package marked, stamped, or labeled as aforesaid, with intent to deceive as to the contents of said box, tub, article, or package, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, upon conviction, shall be fined in any sum not less than $50 nor more than $500.

Hotels, etc., must indicate nature of butter substitutes.—If any hotel, inn, restaurant, or boarding-house keeper shall set before his guests at any meal any of said article, substitute, or compound, the dish or plate holding the same shall have clearly and indelibly marked on some prominent part thereof the words "adulterated butter," or the word "oleomargarine," "butterine," or such other word or words as may correctly describe the article, substance, or compound in said dish or plate.

Penalty.—Whoever shall violate the provisions of section 1588 shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction, shall be fined in any sum not less than $5 nor more than $100.

Definition.—The term "butter" shall be understood to mean the product usually known by that name, which is manufactured exclusively from milk and cream.

Other provisions are found regarding the manufacture and sale of poisonous candies. With reference to native wines it is permissible to sell in original packages, provided the same shall be honestly labeled and contain no poisonous ingredients. (Kirby's Digest, secs. 5096, 5097, 5098, 5099, 5100, 5101, 5102, 5103.)

No provision whatever is made for the enforcement of these laws, except in so far as the law relates to wines. An inspector of wines is provided for. In all my experience as a lawyer, and from my information as a citizen, I have known of no instances in which these statutes are enforced, save, perhaps, in conjuction with city ordinances in the case of the sale of adulterated butter and milk.

Many citizens in that State desire the passage of this bill. I have received a large number of letters and petitions from my constituents asking my support of this measure. The State Association of Pharmacists, while in session at Hot Springs, sent me the following telegram:

HOT SPRINGS, ARK., May 11, 1906.

Hon. JOSEPH T. ROBINSON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

The Arkansas Association of Pharmacists in session here request the support of all the Arkansas Congressmen to the Mann bill. Please advise them of our request.

W. H. SKINNER, President.

California has passed statutes against falsely labeling drugs, false weights, brands, adulterated foods, drinks, and drugs, and defines the words "drug," "food," "adulteration," etc. It also has a provision preventing the manufacture of poisonous candies; requires oleomargarine to be so labeled; renovated butter to bear brand clearly indicating its character to the purchaser; a record is required to be kept of brands and grades of cheese. It regulates the use of imitation products in hotels and boarding houses. The California statute is full, and enforced in conjunction with some such act as that proposed by Congress now, so as to assist the State by simplifying its difficulties and keeping out of the channels of interstate commerce articles of a clearly objectionable nature, it would, in my judgment, avail the citizens of that State much. No special officer, however, is charged with the duty of enforcing these statutes, except in so far as they relate to dairy products, and this duty is vested in the State dairy bureau.

Colorado has made criminal the sale of diseased or adulterated meat, poisonous foods, adulterated and counterfeit foods, tainted and unwholesome food, and has forbidden the adulteration of drugs and foods under severe penalties. The manufacture of adulterated liquors is made unlawful, and the importation of spurious, poisonous, adulterated, or drugged liquors, or liquors mixed with poisonous substances is punishable with a grave penalty. The manufacture and sale of adulterated liquors is strictly forbidden. The statutes of Colorado contain many provisions relating to dairy products and the enforcement of the law in regard to the same, but no provision is made for the enforcement of other food drug laws.

Connecticut has enacted general pure-food and pure-drug laws after which this bill seems in many particulars to be closely modeled. The manufacture of adulterated and misbranded foods is forbidden, and these terms are defined much the same as in the proposed bill. Other provisions relate to alcoholic beverages, use of injurious drugs in brewing, the sale of adulterated liquors, and the inspection by the Secretary of Agriculture of sample packages to be procured from the manufacturer. The whole subject seems to be covered in the Connecticut statute, the provisions relating to water and milk being not the least important.

Delaware has confined her legislation on this subject principally to breadstuff, butter, candy, and fruit, and no officer is charged with the duty of enforcing these laws, with the exception of those relating to breadstuffs (principally for exportation), and the further exception that provision is made for the sampling and inspection of products suspected to be deleterious.

Florida forbids the sale of diseased, corrupted, or unwholesome food by any person without making known to the purchaser its condition. False packing is also forbidden. The statutes cover adulteration of alcoholic beverages, bread, butter, candy, and drugs. Here, as in many other States, no provision whatever is made for the enforcement of the food laws.

Georgia makes the sale of unwholesome foods a misdemeanor, and authorizes an action for damages by the person injured against the seller in case of injury from the same. The sale of adulterated food or drink without giving a true analysis of the article so adulterated is also a misdemeanor. Careful provision is made in regard to the sale of drugged liquors, inspection being required monthly or whenever desired by either buyer or seller. Other provisions in the Georgia statute relate to candies and dairy products. Impure, unwholesome, or adulterated milk, imitation butter or cheese, the use of coloring matter in cheese and butter, the sale of oleomargarine without notice that it is oleomargarine, and the use of the same in hotels without notice to guests that the product is oleomargarine are some features of the law. Enforcement of the laws relating to liquor is provided for, but no special provision is found for any of the remaining statutes.

Idaho forbids the adulteration of foods and drugs, the sale of tainted or diseased food and drugs, the sale of famished animals as food, the sale of imitation or adulterated butter, the manufacture or sale of adulterated or poisonous candy, the manufacture or sale of vinegar containing certain ingredients alleged to be injurious to health; forbids the handling of adulterated vinegar, and requires all receptacles to be marked with kind and standard of strength. No officer is provided to enforce the Idaho laws.

Some of the Territories, including the District of Columbia, Alaska, Hawaii, and Arizona, have enacted pure-food laws, but most of them are without the facilities for enforcing them.

This brief review of State legislation on the subject reveals the fact that with the exception of three or four of the States, legislation in regard to pure food is meager, and that which has been passed, in most instances goes unenforced. Thus the public, in the very vital matter of the food they consume and the medicine they use, is left at the mercy of avaricious manufacturers and dealers, who are constantly poisoning the springs of existence by adulterating the food we eat; by selling as pure and wholesome poisonous substances that kill rather than sustain, and by practicing many forms of fraud and deception which, whether forbidden by State laws or authorized, ought not to be countenanced by the National Government in the control of interstate commerce.

Even if the States had demonstrated a disposition to deal efficiently with the subject, the great expense that is occasioned them by the failure and refusal of Congress to aid in the consummation of the laudable purpose of protecting the public from the injurious effects of poisonous, unwholesome, and adulterated foods, makes necessary this or similar legislation on the part of Congress.

Without the aid of Congress in regulating the transportation of foods and drugs among the States, no State can adequately enforce its statutes enacted under the police powers for the security of the life and health of its citizens. When one considers the multiplied avenues of interstate commerce entering and passing through every State in the Union, the countless express and freight offices where delivery is made of articles shipped from other States, the innumerable points on every railroad, the many wharves and landings to which goods are shipped from foreign States, it is at once apparent that the States can not maintain an effective system of inspection (without great expense), that will enable its officers to ascertain whether the State laws are being evaded or complied with; when we remember that daily jobbers and merchants are selling, over their counters at every market in the State, products which may impair the health of the purchaser, it would be difficult in the extreme to estimate the cost and inconvenience to the State authorities of maintaining and effectively enforcing statutes designed to afford security to the public from the dangers of impure foods and adulterated drugs, if at the same time the railroads and express companies are permitted to carry as commerce every article offered from another State. As already observed, the States can not act extraterritorially; they can not regulate interstate commerce; they can not prevent the importation of recognized articles of commerce.

It is this circumstance, the fact that Congress has failed to do its part in this matter by exercising its power to keep out of the channels of commerce articles that are not to be properly recognized as entitled to that privilege—this failure of Congress to exercise its power has made the State laws relating to impure foods ineffective.

The uniformity that would result from the passage of this bill would be a great benefit to the public. This is a subject peculiarly admitting of uniformity, not in its every detail, indeed, but in its most important particulars. No State ought to want to encourage the manufacture and sale of poisonous and adulterated food, and no State should encourage a manufacturing industry which bases its prosperity upon misbranding and falsely labeling its products. Under the practical operation of every reform difficulties arise which can not be anticipated. Some of these difficulties are latent, while others are devised by the opposition to reform and designed to discountenance and defeat it. I should be glad to see the day when every State shall forbid, by statutes fairly uniform, the manufacture and sale within its limits of all poisonous, adulterated, and misbranded foods, and when the National Government shall deny the character of interstate commerce to all such commodities. This legislation will hasten the coming of that day.

In many of the States there have grown up industries which are so far-reaching in their influences that the States fostering them have refused to regulate them. Some of these industries ship habitually into the different States through the common carriers of interstate commerce tainted food, meats of animals slaughtered while dying from loathsome diseases, the flesh of animals which have died before slaughter. Others manufacture large quantities of beverages which they have grown accustomed to adulterate for market in the various States. Others still have made, and are making, fortunes by the sale to a credulous public of simple food stuffs misbranded and adulterated with worthless substances. Others are deliberately and wickedly placing upon the markets of the States for use by the unfortunates who suffer chronic miseries entailed by heredity and other afflictions which cause them to seek remedies everywhere and apply everything recommended, in the hope of getting relief, alleged medicines, loaded with poisonous drugs, which temporarily allay pain and thus give promise of curative effects. Do you tell me that it is wrong for Congress to forbid the transportation, as articles of interstate commerce, of such products? Do you assert that any State could resent the assistance which Congress would thus give to existing statutes on the ground that it was an interference with the rights of the States? Why should the doctrine of State rights be invoked in justification of indifference to the public welfare?

Do gentlemen here profess that the prevention of the sale to the millions of our population (who have neither the time nor the facilities for analyzing their foods) of adulterated, misbranded, fraudulent, and poisonous foods by denying the commerce character to such articles is an invasion of State rights? What right of any State will be thus invaded? What privilege or right of any State, inherent or reserved, will be restricted? Will not each State still retain its power to pass whatever statutes it chooses for the protection of the lives, the health, the morals of its citizens? Does any gentleman here oppose the passage of this measure because it refuses to lend respectability to fraud, because it denies the designation of "interstate commerce" to substances which none can claim should longer mask behind that name? I yield to no man in my regard for the doctrine of local self-government. But that expression means a government under the laws and Constitution of my country by the exercise of every power, whether State or national, or both if necessary. It does not mean license. The failure of Congress to pass this measure, or one similar, and to thus deny the character of interstate commerce to articles tainted with fraud or loaded with poison will not strengthen or increase the right or power of any State, but it will weaken the confidence which the public has in this Congress.

We are called upon, not to exercise any power reserved to the States, but to exercise the power delegated to Congress to regulate commerce. The exercise of a power does not create it, nor does the nonexercise of it destroy a power that exists. The sphere of Congressional action is circumscribed. It can not invade the States and nullify valid State laws. It can not forbid manufacture for sale within a State where an article is manufactured nor forbid a sale there. But it can prevent the transportation, by common carriers as interstate commerce, articles recognized to be unwholesome, and prevent their sale by the importer in the original package, just as it has forbidden the importation of unwholesome tea. Congress has the same power over commerce between the States that it has over foreign commerce. Practical experience may develop necessity for changes in this measure. It may not be doubted that some difficulties will be met in its enforcement. But when the importance of the subject is considered, the necessity for Congressional action contemplated, those difficulties do not appear insurmountable. It must be something worthy of consideration by this body, that we are permitting the Government, through agencies within its absolute control, to distribute poisons as foods and adulterated products as genuine. I must, indeed, study a new code of morals before I can justify my failure to combine with the power of the States the strength of the nation in protecting the public from the greed of those who count profit above honor and wealth above the rules of fair dealing.

The citizens of every State are entitled to the combined action of State and nation, each operating within its sphere, to ward off the physical and moral degeneracy that must result from the long-continued consumption of impure, adulterated, and poisonous foods. The citizen has little opportunity for personal inspection of the products he consumes and is without the means of accurately determining the genuineness of the articles he feeds upon. In practical life we rarely see the articles we consume until they are served in the most attractive way that can be devised. Is it incumbent on the Government to admit to the character of interstate commerce every commodity offered, without regard to its purity or wholesomeness? To ask the question is to answer it. Admittedly the States can not regulate interstate commerce. The Congress can. Private enterprises in some localities may suffer from the enactment of this law, but an enterprise that thrives by fraud, and poisons while it pretends to feed, does not deserve to prosper and can not demand the aid of government to continue its existence. Neither can it invoke the police powers of the State to compete with honest, legitimate enterprise through interstate commerce and thus cheat the public. A fair application of the principles of this proposed law can not harm any legitimate business. It is unfair to assume that the law will not be properly enforced. It is begging the question to assert that the agents of the Government intrusted with the enforcement of the law, if it be enacted, may be partial and unjust. There is, practically speaking, no such thing as exact justice. But there is a sense of equality before the law, of fair dealing and reasonable application, that underlies all our institutions and statutes, and makes possible the maintenance of order and the development of industry. The health and comfort of American citizens is above any consideration of private gain. Colossal profits, based on frauds, can not offset the detriment of a poisoned and degenerated citizenship.

The real source of opposition to this measure is the fear that it will operate partially, discriminate against legitimate industries, and thus become a means of oppression, while affording no remedy for the evils against which it is directed. But such objection may be made to any statute. The possibility of impartiality in the enforcement of a law is inherent in every law that can be enacted. Law can not make officers honest, nor can it always compel efficiency. There is nothing unfair in this bill, nothing oppressive, although some features of it may be and doubtless are imperfect. But experience and the wisdom of future Congresses, in my judgment, may be relied upon to correct such mistakes as we may make. I have no fear that legitimate industry will suffer by the passage of this bill. Manufacturers and jobbers who make and sell as genuine adulterated products, who place upon our markets as wholesome poisonous foods and drugs, are commercial brigands who rob the citizen of both his health and his money, and one must be cross-eyed in his moral vision to see merit in their claims. It is far from any thought or purpose of mine to oppress any citizen, to discourage any proper business, to restrict any authority in the States, and if I believed that such would be the effect of passing this bill, I would most assuredly oppose it. But, honestly believing that legislation of this character is needed, that it is within the province of Congress to enact it, that it does not impair the right of the States to govern themselves in all matters of local concern, and that it will aid the States in protecting their citizens from the irreparable injuries of impure foods and drugs, I cheerfully give it my support. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired. [Loud applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I would ask, Mr. Chairman, leave to revise and amplify my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Chair hears no objection. The Chair understands the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] yields ten minutes to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] desires to be recognized for a moment.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, we were all deeply interested yesterday in the able and instructive speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The exhibition of adulterated and short-weight goods now shown on the floor of the House speaks in language unmistakably for the adoption of a remedy.

I shall call attention to the salient points in the pending bill now under discussion, beginning with section 7.

Section 7 of the House bill relates to the subject of "misbranding," and is the section the provisions of which have given rise to the greatest controversy. It provides that the term "misbranded" shall apply to all drugs or articles of food, or articles which enter into the composition of food, which bear any statement, design, or device on the package or label regarding the ingredients or substances contained therein, or the article as a whole, which shall be false or misleading in any particular; and to any food or drug product falsely branded as to the State, Territory, or country in which it is manufactured or produced; that also a drug shall be deemed "misbranded" if it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the name of another article, or if the contents of the original package have been removed in whole or in part and other contents substituted, or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of alcohol, or of opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance contained therein.

It is proposed to offer an amendment to this provision, which in effect will provide that the quantity of alcohol or narcotic need not be stated upon a pharmacopœia remedy prepared in accordance with the pharmacopœia formulary, but that on other preparations of drugs the amount of alcohol and of opium, morphine, cocaine, heroin, alpha and beta eucaine, acetanilid, and chloral hydrate shall be stated, so that people may be informed who purchase prepared medicines whether they are taking habit-forming drugs or alcoholic compounds.

"Food" shall be considered as adulterated if it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, or if labeled or branded so as to deceive the purchaser, or falsely purport to be a foreign product, or, if in package form, the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight and measure on the outside of the package.

An amendment will be offered to the package provision somewhat modifying the arbitrary provision, but still protecting the purchaser and the honest manufacturer from the fraud of those who wish to cheat and swindle by short weight or measure.

It ought also to be considered as misbranding of food if the contents of the original package shall have been removed in whole or in part and other contents placed in the package, or if the package fails to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any of the narcotic drugs.

The section provides that an article of food not containing added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed adulterated or misbranded in case of mixture, or compounds known as articles of food under their own distinctive names and not imitations, if the name be accompanied on the label with a statement of the place where the article has been manufactured or produced, and also that food shall not be deemed adulterated or misbranded in case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate they are compounds, imitations, or blends, provided that the term "blend" as used therein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substance, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients.

The provisions in the House bill which covers the subject of liquor, as well as other articles of food and drink, is that an article shall not be deemed misbranded when labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that it is a compound, imitation, or blend, provided that the term "blend" as used therein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substance, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients.

Section 13 of the House bill and of the Senate bill provides for seizing and confiscating adulterated or misbranded articles by process of libel for condemnation.

Section 14 of the act proposes to put in permanent statute the provisions which have been carried in the agricultural appropriation bill for several years, authorizing examinations to be made of imported articles of food and drugs and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to refuse entry and delivery when found to be adulterated or misbranded.

The most remarkable thing about the bill under consideration is the state of affairs which it intends to correct, to use a paradox. We are so used in these days to having deception practiced on us, we have grown so accustomed to it, that we no longer realize its enormity. It is taken as a matter of course, as part of the status quo of the things we are born heir to, and as having perhaps some right to exist.

Yet when we stop to take thought of the matter, we realize that a state of things exists which should bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every honest man and woman or to one who is inclined to raise truth and fair dealing only slightly above the mad greed for the mighty dollar. [Applause.]

It would seem that wherever we turn in the business or manufacturing world we meet with deception in many cases on a mighty scale. Not only is the very spirit of competition driving out all respect for honest representation of wares, but it tends to the imposition of dishonest wares upon an unsuspecting public. Perhaps the spirit of competition is held responsible for too much, and its back is broken with the heavy burden of misplaced blame; we might therefore be somewhat lenient and endeavor to rightfully place a part of the blame.

But in the endeavor to do so we are obliged to fall back upon the worst elements in human nature, which impel men to squeeze a profit from every trade. We are all familiar with the famous horse deals so liberally sprinkled in popular literature, and with the efforts of trusts and millionaires, as elaborated by the sensational press. These are only samples of what is taking place in almost every trade and industry, in manufacturing and business, even at times in the professions and arts. And that is the sad part of it, that in the endeavor to live and to pursue their lives in a Christian fashion, men will stoop to questionable methods, adopting as their motto that rule which has always been falsely attributed to the Jesuits, "that the end justifies the means."

And this is the state of affairs which is disclosed after a careful and cold-blooded analysis, and which the bill under discussion is endeavoring to correct in certain lines of trade and manufacture. Prepared foods and food products are so adulterated as to either reduce the quality or increase the quantity for the purpose of saving cost of production on the one hand or to increase the cash income on the other. Valuable ingredients in the natural foods are cleverly, ingeniously substituted by chemicals, with the same object in view. Drinks and condiments are treated in the same way. But when we take up the matter of drugs and chemicals themselves the field grows so vast that the mind of no man here is able to grasp it all or to go to the bottom of the subject.

Enough has been shown during all the years that pure foods have been under discussion by State legislatures and Congress to prove that the enormity exists; that a cancerous growth of giant proportions has been built up on a foundation of fraud and deceit, and that the public has been the victim for so long that it might be said to have grown accustomed to it, and to have thrived on it; at least so those who have profited by it might claim. This was developed in the recent meat investigation, so fresh in the minds of the people of the world. [Applause.]

But the one phase of the subject that has received no attention is, of course, the moral one. We are so busy hunting evidence that we do not stop long enough to remember how repugnant all of it is; that misrepresentation has been elevated into a virtue of business; that men grow rich by stuffing false foods into the stomachs of their fellow-citizens, and by trying to cure their ills by medicines that produce new ills or which fail to cure.

The bill under consideration aims to put a stop to at least some of this fraud and deceit as it may exist in the District of Columbia and the Territories and in interstate commerce. After years of agitation Congress has at last decided to interfere in the interests of the people and to really do something in their behalf. It might be interesting to know why it takes so many years for a measure of this kind to receive the sanction of the people's Representatives, but the reasons have been given so often by advocates of tariff-reduction bills and other acts for the real people's benefit that it would be idle and useless to go over them now. It is sufficient to say that the powerful manufacturing interests are always more potent with some of these Representatives than the people themselves—another illustration of the intrenched power of the trusts and industrial combinations and the lack of organization on the part of the consumers.

However, Congress has at last decided to do something, and that something, as embodied in the bill under consideration, is so worthy that no one should hesitate about supporting it. The only regret is that its provisions are not applicable to the internal commerce of the States. We might say that this is an instance where constitutional limitation prevents us from doing something good for the public; but the bill carries a remedy for this regret by suggesting that the States may follow the action of Congress by enacting uniform laws upon the pure-food question, and that the officials intrusted with the enforcement of the law, in both nation and State, may frequently consult for the purpose of fixing exact standards of food products and drugs. As a first step in the right direction the bill is excellent, and it gives me pleasure to raise my voice in its behalf and to cast my vote for its passage.

I have but one objection to the bill, and that is to the provision which exempts foods and drugs intended for foreign commerce from the restriction and penalties of the measure. Now that we have made up our minds to protect our own citizens from fraud and deception—to do a little needed house cleaning, as it were—we should not continue to believe that the foreigners are still fit subjects for such practices and that we can broom onto them that which we would not accept ourselves. It makes us look ridiculous when we stop to make such distinctions, and it tends to make our foreign customers look with suspicion upon all of our commerce. We take no means to conceal the fact that fraud can be practiced upon them; that anything can be palmed off on them so long as it looks and tastes well and a stiff price is charged for it.

While about it we might as well have gone that much further and forbidden our manufacturers from selling to the foreigner for genuine what we forbid them selling to our own citizens. It requires no stretch of imagination to know why this step was not taken. It shows that the protected interests have not lost all their influence, even though Congress has at last decided to pass a pure-food bill.

But as half a loaf is better than none, and charity begins at home, I am most willing to support this present bill as amended in spite of my objection to the foreign-commerce exemption; and I shall hope that it may not be very long before Congress will remedy the matter and relieve itself and the American people from the reproach of perpetrating fraud upon our customers abroad who like and need our products.

And how strange it is that a measure of this kind, aiming to do so much good to the people and to prevent so much unfair dealing, should meet with opposition. Of course every reform that the world or a nation, or even a community or a single family, has inaugurated has been bitterly fought and has only been accomplished after incredible struggles and heartburnings. It is one of the traits of human nature to stick to the things that are, however ill, rather than fly to the new things—the ills that may be. And in the present instance we have no exception to the rule. And yet, I repeat, it seems so strange that a good can only be accomplished after a determined fight. I believe that if a movement was started to abolish the kingdom of Satan that the usual mighty opposition would at once arise, even in this House.

Fortunately, the character of the evil and the suggested remedy are so plain and simple that the opposition can be easily concentrated and analyzed for what it is worth. We find that it consists only of those interests which have fattened for years upon fraudulent goods imposed upon a patient people, of interests which have grown so large and powerful that they resent interference as an impertinence, as a meddling with sacred property rights. Although they enjoy no special franchise or privilege, they feel that the superstructure which they have erected upon the gullibility of the people is sacred by reason of its mere existence; and we have the novel spectacle of a cancer being spared from the knife, even though the body on which it festers should die. That some necessary amendments will be adopted before the bill passes goes without saying.

It is always the same class of people, however, who object—the protected interests, clamoring for a continuance of the protection, of the aids which have given them life, strength, and wealth, and without which they could not thrive at the expense of the people. It would be too much to expect governments to go back to the "laissez faire" days, the days of the "hands-off" doctrine; but if we could only adopt a little of it in these times, how many trusts would fall to the ground at once, how many frauds would be exposed and driven out of business? In other words, the people demand a "square deal" all around.

The Interstate Commerce Committee has listened to many people on the subject of pure food, and most of them have been in opposition; but, of course, they have represented manufacturing interests, who felt that their business would be injured by the passage of such an act. Representatives have been liberally supplied with literature from similar sources, with the object of convincing them that the interests of their constituents demanded the defeat of the bill. And no stone is left unturned if it can be made an obstacle to its progress.

I would like to read a letter received from my friend, Dr. Thomas Darlington, the present commissioner of health in the city of New York, a man well known all over the country for his efficient services in making New York one of the healthiest cities and one of the best in which to live in the world:

CITY OF NEW YORK, DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH,
OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF HEALTH,
New York, March 8, 1906.

Col. J. A. GOULDEN,
180 Broadway, New York City.

SIR: I wish to call your attention to the patent-medicine clause in the pure-food bill which is now before the House of Representatives, since it will be on this clause that one of the serious attacks upon the bill will be made. The clause provides briefly, as you will see by a reading of it, that all poisons contained in patent medicines be stated upon the label, and that any patent medicine shall be deemed misbranded which carries on its label any misstatement.

This seems to me, and I believe will appeal to you, as an eminently fair and honest proviso. The Proprietary Association of America has its representatives in Washington working against the provision, and ready to work against the whole bill in case the clause is permitted to remain in it. You have undoubtedly received their literature and heard from them in other ways.

Therefore I urge you to take into account, no matter what their arguments may be, that the patent-medicine section as it stands is simply a requirement of fair play, such as to safeguard the public and to let the purchaser know what he is purchasing in the field of proprietary medicines.

Very sincerely, yours, THOMAS DARLINGTON, Commissioner.

This is a sample of the opposition that has been raised to the pure-food bill. But as we have listened to it for many years now and have seen how hollow and selfish it all is, we have at last determined to ignore it and to do a little something for the people. It is a pleasure to be able to say that the people's representatives are really representing them and not the interests that have been greedily preying on them, and I am proud to be able to aid by my vote the passage of so worthy an act.

The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has set a fashion in tombstone inscriptions by desiring his vote on the Philippine annexation question duly carved on his. Let me ditto his sentiments as to my vote on the pure-food and good-meat questions. [Loud applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STERLING having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 20321. An act to provide for the traveling expenses of the President of the United States.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. ADAMSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GILL] ten minutes.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Chairman, there is unquestionably a demand for the enactment of constitutional legislation by Congress, under the interstate-commerce clause, by which it shall cooperate with the several States in protecting the health and lives of our citizens against the ravenous greed of those who would injure or destroy them in their unholy and criminal efforts to secure wealth through disease-breeding and poisonous adulteration of both food and drink. It is my desire to aid as far as possible in securing the passage of such legislation as will promote the preservation of the purity of food and drink for both man and beast. But in considering such legislation we should not permit ourselves, under the hysteria of the moment, to enact imperfect measures which may be fraught with greater harm to our true interests than the evils which we are seeking to remedy. In my opinion, danger signals have been hoisted in this Congress, warning us of governmental rocks upon which our country may be stranded if the tendency to enact extreme, crude, ill-considered, and preferential legislation is not curbed. These signals admonish us to seek more persistently and to observe more carefully than in the past the line of demarcation between the powers reserved to the States and those granted to the Federal Government. In this body, by reason of its rules, we are fast reaching, if we have not already reached, a method of legislation which in the future will be known as "committee autocracy." By the extraordinary increase, within a very short time, of departments and bureaus we are beginning to emulate, in the executive branch of our Government, those States which history denominates as "Governments of bureaucracy." "Committeeautocracy" and "bureaucracy" are both departures from the methods of our democratic forefathers and are grave dangers to republican institutions. The one fosters preferential legislation for the benefit of privileged classes; the other creates an army of officeholders so great as to threaten with destruction our party government.

Senate bill No. 88, commonly known as the "pure-food bill," which has been passed by the Senate and for which the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has proposed a substitute, is now before us. This substitute is a striking manifestation of the tendency to which I have tried to draw your attention.

In section 10 of the committee's bill it is provided, among other things, that—

> Every person * * * who manufactures or produces for shipment * * * from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any drug or article of food, and every person who * * * exposes for sale * * * any drug or article of food received from a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia other than the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which he exposes for sale * * * such drug or article of food, etc.—

Shall be required to furnish a sample of such commodity to the authorized agent of the Government for the purposes of analysis, and by section 11 it is further provided that any such person who fails to comply with the terms of section 10 shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

Even a superficial reading of this section (10) of the committee's bill brings home the conviction that through it Congress is seeking to regulate manufacturing within the States and sales purely intrastate, a function which it is powerless and never was intended to exercise. It is a firmly established principle of constitutional law, that under the interstate clause the jurisdiction of Congress extends only to the regulation of commerce among the several States, with the Indian tribes, and with foreign nations. By seeking to compel a person "who manufactures for shipment" or "exposes for sale" any drug or article of food to furnish a sample thereof to an agent of the Government, which sample might furnish the basis of a criminal prosecution against him, Congress is trying to trench on the police powers of the State.

One of the many instructive cases in which this principle is lucidly stated and the boundaries between the reserved power of the States and the powers granted to the Federal Government clearly defined is In re Greene, 53 Federal Reporter, 104.

In this case the court uses the following language:

> It is equally clear that Congress has no jurisdiction over and can not make criminal the aims, purposes, and intentions of persons in the acquisition and control of property which the States of their residence or creation sanction and permit. It is not material that such property, or the products thereof, may become the subject of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations. Commerce among the States, within the exclusive regulating power of Congress, "consists of intercourse and traffic between their citizens, and includes the transportation of persons and property, as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." (County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S., 691–702; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S., 203, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep., 826.)
> In the application of this comprehensive definition, it is settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court that such commerce begins and the regulating power of Congress attaches when the commodity or thing traded in commences its transportation from the State of its production or situs to some other State or foreign country and terminates when the transportation is completed and the property has become a part of the general mass of the property in the States of its destination.
> When the commerce begins is determined, not by the character of the commodity, nor by the intention of the owner to transfer it to another State for sale, nor by his preparation of it for transportation, but by its actual delivery to a common carrier for transportation or the actual commencement of its transfer to another State. At that time the power and regulating authority of the State ceases and that of Congress attaches and continues until it has reached another State and becomes mingled with the general mass of property in the latter State; that neither the production nor manufacture of articles or commodities which constitute subjects of commerce and which are intended for trade and traffic with citizens of other States, nor the preparation for their transportation from the State where produced or manufactured, prior to the commencement of the actual transfer or transmission thereof to another State, constitutes that interstate commerce which comes within the regulating power of Congress, and, further, that after the termination of the transportation of commodities or articles of traffic from one State to another and the mingling or merging thereof in the general mass of property in the State of destination, the sale, distribution, and consumption thereof in the latter State forms no part of interstate commerce. (Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western Union Tel. Co., 96 U. S., 1; Brown v. Houston, 114 U. S., 622, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep., 1091; Coe v. Errol, 116 U. S., 517–520, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep., 475; Robbins v. Taxing Dist., 120 U. S., 407, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep., 592, and Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S., 1, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep., 6.) In the latter case the Supreme Court pointed out the distinction between commerce and the subjects thereof, and held that the manufacture of distilled spirits, even though they were intended for export to other States, was not commerce falling within the regulating powers of Congress.

Clearly, then, that part of this bill which seeks to regulate the manufacture of a commodity within a State where made, or to regulate its disposition or sale after its transportation has been completed and it has become part of the general mass of the property in the State of its destination, is valueless legislation and beyond the power of Congress to enact.

This imperfection, however, is not the only one in this bill. In my judgment the House Committee on Foreign and Interstate Commerce has most seriously weakened the Senate measure by its attempt to incorporate in this bill an imperfect provision safeguarding fair trade by weight and measure. Certainly fair trade by weight and measure is not germane to pure food. A pure-food measure is framed to protect men's stomachs and, through their stomachs, their health and lives. A requirement for fair trade by weight and measure is designed to promote bona fides in matters of contract and the observance of a higher standard of morality in commercial transactions. But even if the subject of fair trade by weight and measure were relevant in a pure-food measure, it seems to me that with the three lines which the committee has inserted on this subject it would be impossible to cover so vast a field. It is to be hoped that in the consideration of this weight-and-measure provision of the bill the House will not, as it did with the rate bill, assume the infallibility of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in the end only to have the Senate reform it with eighty amendments.

So far as I have been able to ascertain, there has been no demand for a law insuring fair trade by weight or measure. But granting that there were, this paragraph, by which it is sought to satisfy such a demand, fails utterly to do so. It reads as follows:

In the case of food, if in package form, the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight and measure on the outside of the package—

it shall be deemed misbranded. This paragraph is vitally defective in three respects: First, it imposes upon a large and important class of our population duties and obligations which are onerous and foreign to them and which, as the paragraph now stands, do not compensate the consumer with any corresponding benefits. Secondly, the word "package," as used in this section, conveys no such legal signification of the term as would render it possible to enforce the penalties provided for a violation of this part of the proposed law. Thirdly, there is no national standard of weights and measures, none having ever been established by Congress, nor is any provided for in this bill.

Section 5 of this bill provides "that the term 'food,' as used herein, shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound." This provision is so comprehensive, so all-embracing that in its application it affects the business operations of a large class of our people and all kinds of articles of foods and drugs. It includes the products of our fisheries, the products of almost every garden and farm in the land, and every modification of the natural product when these products enter into interstate commerce. It affects every farmer, every fisherman, every canner, every preserver or modifier of foods, as well as every other person who may become the shipper of any article of food as defined in this bill. Indeed, the magnitude and vastness of its application is commensurate only with our population and the volume of our food production.

The State of Maryland alone, with a population of a little over a million, exported last year upward of 2,000,000 bushels of oysters in cans, buckets, and barrels. There were preserved and exported by the farmers and canners of that State about 250,000,000 tins of agricultural products, including vegetables and fruits of every kind and description grown in the State of Maryland and the surrounding States. Food products and the modifications thereof gave to the carriers in Maryland a greater amount of freight than any other class of commodities. Hence the interest of the people of our State in this measure, which they believe will impose upon them onerous obligations without any corresponding benefits to the consumer.

What did the framers of this weight and measure provision intend its phraseology to embrace? Those who have been impelled to study this provision by the belief that it will affect them in their business or occupation labor under the impression that it seeks to compel the shipper or manufacturer of drugs or articles of food to mark on every single unit which may be used in making up a package the quantity of its contents in terms of weight or measure; that the farmer who ships a crate of strawberries must brand on each small box in the crate the weight or measure of its contents; that the farmer who ships a crate of eggs containing a number of baskets or boxes is required to have weighed the quantity of eggs in each box or basket which goes to make up the crate and mark each box or parcel therein in order to comply with the requirements of this provision; that the canner who puts up his goods in tins and sells them by sample is required to mark each tin, which may be the units of a larger package, in terms of weight or measure. But does the language of this paragraph, judicially defined, really mean this? And if it does not mean this, does it avail us anything to insert this provision in the bill?

In Guckenheimer v. Sellers (81 Fed. Rep., 997) the court said:

Where bottles or packages are fastened together and marked, or are placed in a larger box, barrel, or crate, or other receptacle, and shipped therein, the outside box, bundle, or receptacle, and not any bottle or package contained therein, constitutes the original package.

In the well-known case of Commonwealth v. Schollenberger (Pa.) (27 Atl. Rep., 33) the court uses this language:

Such packages put up with a view to the convenience and security of transportation and handling in the regular course of trade are the original packages of commerce. * * * "Original" means pertaining to the beginning or origin; the first or primitive form of a thing. "Package" means a bundle or parcel made up of several smaller parcels combined or bound together in a box, crate, or other form of package. An original package is such form and size of package as is used by the producers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of actual commerce. Such packages are not always made up by putting smaller packages or bundles together, but may include any form of receptacle that shall hold a fixed quantity, as a barrel of sugar or salt, a bag of coffee, a chest of tea, and the like. (Approved in Parson's case, 27 Southwestern Rep., 1104; also in Haley v. State (Nebr.), 27 American State Rep., 723.)

The court has here defined separately the word "original" and the word "package," and its definition of "package" is not controlled or affected by the adjective "original" prefixed thereto, which merely serves to identify the package as the one primarily placed in the hands of the carrier and by the carrier delivered to the consignee.

The definition of "package" in this case applies equally to the word "package" as used in the paragraph I am now discussing, and would unquestionably permit a manufacturer to label, under the requirements of this section for branding, the outside box, bundle, or receptacle with the weight or measure of its contents, and such labeling would be a compliance with the terms of this paragraph. It would not be necessary for him to mark any of the parcels or bundles which go to make up this package. As to the packages which the court has defined as containing a fixed quantity—such as a barrel of sugar—in contradistinction to those which are made up of or contain a number of smaller parcels or bundles, of course there is no question as to where the label should be put. It is almost a universal custom and practice to ship a number of smaller parcels in a package for convenience in handling in interstate transportation. The small parcel, which is the one that reaches the consumer and which it would be proper to mark with the information of value to the consumer, is by the terms of this paragraph exempted from its operation. We may shed a little more light on this subject by placing together the language of the first part of the first section and the language used in the paragraph under discussion. Thus placed together it reads: "Shipment of food in package form." Can the word "package," as used here, mean any other package than that which is delivered for shipment to the carrier to be by him "introduced" into another State or Territory? If not, then this package, which is delivered to the carrier to be transported to another State or Territory, is the one which, under this paragraph, should be branded with the weight or measure of its contents, and not the parcels or packages which it contains, though they may number a thousand. If the framers of this paragraph had intended that the parcels or bundles which are the units that make up this package—such as the small boxes of strawberries in a crate or cans of preserved fruits or vegetables in a box—should each bear the weight or measure brand, then the language employed to convey that meaning is unquestionably vague, uncertain, and capable of a different interpretation. As it now stands it is a trap for the wary as well as for the unwary. Certainly such a foundation is too flimsy and insecure upon which to rear the structure of a penal offense.

Though this vagueness as to the term "package" may give way to words more specific and definite, there is, in my judgment, a graver difficulty to be dealt with in this paragraph for fair trade by weight and measure—one more organic than the defect which I have just been discussing. Congress has never fixed a standard of weights and measures for the United States, notwithstanding its constitutional authority to do so. It has authorized the adoption of standards for the custom-house and in various acts has defined certain standards of weights and measures to be used in the custom-houses in the levying of duties on certain classes of goods. Complete sets of the various weights and measures in use in the Treasury Department and the custom-houses have been furnished to all the States and Territories, and, with certain modifications, have been adopted by nearly all of them as their standard of weights and measures. But the modifications to which these standards of weights and measures of the various States have been subjected are so great and universal that practically there is a different standard of weights and measures in every State. In addition to the weights and measures prescribed for the use of the custom-houses, Congress has legalized a metric standard of weights and measures and authorizes the use of this system in the custom-houses, the Government offices, and by the citizens of the several States.

This act, however, does not undertake to prescribe a system of weights and measures for the United States, so that we have this condition: The Government has adopted a standard of weights and measures for the custom-houses, has prescribed the use of another standard—the metric system—in the custom-houses, and has legalized the use of the metric system so far as the citizens of this country may choose to use it. Fifty-one States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, have each adopted a standard of weights and measures. The use of these standards is compulsory upon the citizens of these States and Territories, except in so far as the act of Congress of July 28, 1866, making it lawful to employ the weights and measures of the metric system, may have modified the State laws on this subject. The acts and resolutions of Congress bearing out my statement that Congress has never established a standard of weights and measures for the United States are as follows: Resolution of May 19, 1828; resolution of June 14, 1836; act of July 28, 1866; resolution of July 27, 1866, which read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of securing a due conformity in weight of the coins of the United States * * * the brass troy pound weight procured by the minister of the United States at London, in the year 1827, for the use of the Mint, and now in the custody of the mint at Philadelphia, shall be the standard troy pound of the Mint of the United States, conformably to which the coinage thereof shall be regulated.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to cause a complete set of all weights and measures adopted as standards and now either made or in progress of manufacture for the use of the several custom-houses, and for other purposes, to be delivered to the governor of each State in the Union, or such person as he may appoint, for the use of the States, respectively, to the end that a uniform standard of weights and measures may be established throughout the United States.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful throughout the United States of America to employ the weights and measures of the metric system, and no contract or dealing or pleading in any court shall be deemed invalid or liable to objection because the weights or measures expressed or referred to therein are weights or measures of the metric system.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the tables in the schedule hereto annexed shall be recognized in the construction of contracts and in all legal proceedings as establishing the terms of the weights and measures now in use in the United States the equivalents of the weights and measures expressed therein in terms of the metric system; and said tables may be lawfully used for computing, determining, and expressing in customary weights and measures the weights and measures of the metric system.

Be it resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to furnish to each State, to be delivered to the governor thereof, one set of standard weights and measures of the metric system for the use of the States, respectively.

Now, let me submit this question to the framers of this weight and measure paragraph of the bill. There being no national standard of weights and measures, what standard of weights and measures have you adopted in this bill? Clearly none. Hence this weight and measure paragraph is utterly void and valueless, and should be stricken from the bill. No attempt should be made to impose conditions requiring weight or measure on the interstate commerce of the country until Congress has exercised its constitutional function of prescribing a uniform standard of weights and measures for the United States.

But if by any possible interpretation the language of this weight and measure paragraph may be made to imply the use of the standards adopted in the different States and Territories under their laws and those adopted by Congress for its custom-houses, its effect on interstate commerce would be disastrous and deplorable. The wide and almost universal differences between the various State standards of weights and measures would breed endless confusion.

A Maryland shipper of a bag of potatoes labels it as containing 1 bushel, which must weigh 56 pounds in Maryland. He ships it to a commission merchant in Virginia, where the same bag of potatoes, marked a bushel, to be correctly marked, should weigh 60 pounds. In Virginia the sale of this bag of potatoes, as marked in Maryland, would be illegal and fraudulent. Again, a barrel of turnips, marked 3 bushels in Wisconsin, need only contain 42 pounds to the bushel. Shipped to the State of South Dakota, it should contain 60 pounds to the bushel. Its sale in South Dakota as 3 bushels of potatoes would also be illegal and fraudulent. If marked by weight, what weight would be compulsory, avoirdupois or troy, between which there is a well-known difference? If by measure, by the dry quart or by the liquid quart? A commodity might be composed of a liquid and a solid, which measure would be compulsory in such a case? Indeed, the difficulties that present themselves are so great, so complex, that, unless Congress prescribes the adoption of the metric system or some other uniform system of weights and measures throughout the United States, they would be absolutely insurmountable.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me ask why a weight and measure paragraph is incorporated in and is insisted upon by the framers of a pure-food bill. There is no public clamor for it either in the press or by petitions to this body. There is even no ordinary demand for it. It could not subserve the purposes of preserving the purity of food. Indeed, it threatens to overload the whole structure of this bill and to topple it over into the slough of defeat. I do not believe the proposers thereof seek to impose additional burdens on the agricultural and piscatorial classes of our people, but they certainly will if this provision is adopted. It requires them, directly and indirectly, to purchase labels, weights, and measures, and to employ additional labor. Are they not already sufficiently taxed? Is not their real and personal property subjected to State and county taxation? Does not Congress mulct ample tribute from them by levying tariff duties on their clothing, their food, and their implements? Does Congress not exact more from them through its internal-revenue tax on the grain and tobacco products of the land? Yet, insatiate, you seek further of their substance through this delusive weight and measure clause. Are you impelled by an uncontrollable desire to breed new trusts in this country? Do you wish to foster a weight and measure trust by creating an inordinate demand for their products, or do you want to provide more spoils with which to fatten an overprotected paper trust at the expense of the toilers of the deep and the tillers of the soil?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] desires to be recognized for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] is recognized.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, if Congress will enact this pure-food bill into law it will be entitled to the everlasting gratitude of the American people. [Applause.] The distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] gave us yesterday a splendid demonstration of the frauds and artifices practiced in the use of deleterious and unhealthful food adulterants. He ably demonstrated, too, how the public are deceived by the use of short weight and measures, and after that interesting exhibition and lucid explanation no one in the House can longer doubt the necessity of a pure-food law.

We have been told by some of the distinguished lawyers in our body that the bill is unconstitutional. Others of equal legal ability have declared that it is valid, and does not conflict with any constitutional provision. True, Mr. Chairman, in the enactment of statutes we ought to exercise care in their framing, and reasonable caution that none of their provisions contravene the fundamental law of the land. We ought to proceed with care not to infringe upon the restrictions and limitations imposed by the supreme law of the land. But I see nothing here which would make the measure before us invalid. If the doubt as to the constitutionality is as great as that expressed on the one hand, and the belief in the validity is as strong as that asserted on the other, let us in the interest of the public health, in the interest of honest dealing, in the interest of life itself, resolve that doubt in favor of the bill and let the courts settle the disputed questions. Let Congress do something now, here at this moment, that may lend protection to the health of the citizen; that may put a stop, so far as Federal legislation can do it, to the frauds practiced on an unsuspecting public, and that may help to preserve the life of our fellow-countrymen. [Applause.]

The recent disclosures of the packing-house scandals, and those which prove the putting on the market of unwholesome, adulterated food and drink have weakened the confidence of the public. We have been shocked at these disclosures, and from every section of the country comes a demand for a pure-food law. Its passage will restore public confidence; it will tell the fraud and the evil doer that the day of money getting at the expense of life and health of the consumer is at an end. Let us enact such legislation that we may not again be nauseated by such reports as we have had from the meat-packing houses. The bill will in some measure insure to the public protection against the oil they ought not to have palmed off on them—cotton-seed oil. When they buy honey they ought not to have palmed off on them prepared glucose, with a dead bee cunningly thrown in to convey the idea they are getting the real product of the bee. When they buy canned salmon they ought not to be given canned codfish artfully prepared to resemble the salmon; and so on. And when they buy canned goods they ought to be sure that punishment is in store for the dishonest canner who would put up unwholesome or rotten food treated with preservatives.

Without going further into the details that require this legislation, let me express the hope that we shall proceed speedily to give to the country a law that will make for honesty of dealing and for protection of the life and health of our citizens. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how does the time stand?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has thirty-one minutes remaining and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has fifty minutes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my unexpired time if I have any.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] fifteen minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, one of the great industries of Maryland is the packing of its home products.

The Secretary of Agriculture, Hon. James Wilson, has recently said that Maryland is the best State in the Union for agriculture and horticulture.

I believe that Maryland offers greater opportunities for the successful and profitable growth of diversified crops than any other State in the Union, with locations obtainable to suit the tastes of the most fastidious, even though they be as many and as varied as the varieties of the products that so delightful and uniform a climate as Maryland can produce. It matters not whether they prefer the mountain slope, the hillside, the valley, or plain, each can be found in Maryland, either washed by the waves of the Atlantic, the waters of the great Chesapeake Bay, the placid rivers flowing therein, or the cool rivulets and babbling mountain brooks, all of which are in unison for the promotion of the growth of crops in spring and summer and the protection of the delicate fruit buds of the vine and tree during the winter's frost, which season but for the rarefication of the atmosphere by these waters, might prove to be blasting.

Everything in the shape of grasses, grains, fruits, and vegetables that grow under similar climatic influences flourish in Maryland soil, whether indigenous or otherwise; hence the greatest possibility for diversification exists, the advantages of which are clearly apparent to the intelligent farmer, for he knows full well that if his planting is confined to one or two crops, and the season should prove adverse to these, his profits would be very small, or, perhaps, the balance on the wrong side of the account; when, on the other hand, if he sowed wheat, planted corn, strawberries, blackberries, raspberries, canteloupes, melons, potatoes, tomatoes, and other cereals, fruits, and vegetables as commend themselves to the market and his taste of culture, within the scope of his ability to properly cultivate and handle, there can be no total failure with him any year, because there is never a season in this State so unpropitious but that some of these crops mature and are profitable, and in most cases the great majority of them.

Among the Maryland products most commonly canned in the State are tomatoes, corn, peaches, pears, strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, lima beans, sweet potatoes, pumpkins, and oysters, the last named being the product of the great Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries. Pineapples, while not a Maryland product, are also largely canned in Baltimore. Baltimore has been called "the cradle of the canning industry," and according to the best authorities, Maryland not only leads in oyster canning business, but is also among the first States in the Union in the canning of fruits and vegetables.

The first patent for a tin can for hermetically sealed food was granted to Peter Durand, in England, in 1810. It was brought to America shortly after, and Maryland, or more particularly Baltimore, was the first place in the United States where the packing of fruits, vegetables, and oysters in cans was successfully carried on, although glass was used before tin. Previous to 1850 the cans were made by hand; subsequently machinery took the place of hand labor.

The packing of fruits and vegetables extended until the industry has grown to such immense proportions that it has become important to every State in the Union and to almost every farmer in the States. Probably the greatest development of canneries in Maryland occurred between 1885 and 1895. Great increase in machinery, the novel and improved methods of processing, and the rapid growth of the industry resulted in largely cheapening the price of the product.

According to the history of the packing industry, in 1894 there were 1,900 known canned-goods packing firms in 42 States who operated over 2,000 canneries, of which 25 per cent were in Maryland; and the total output for that year was computed to have been about 700,000,000 cans. The total aggregate value of canned goods for 1894, as estimated, was $71,250,000, and would have required 58,750 box cars to carry the pack at 500 cases to the car and two dozen cans to the case. It would have required at that time 2,000,000 boxes of tin plate, 30,000,000 cases, and 700,000,000 labels to complete the pack for shipping. The growth of the packing business in Maryland is estimated to have amounted to fully 40 per cent in the decade of 1890 and 1900.

In Maryland tomatoes are more largely canned than any other product of the State, and, indeed, some seasons Maryland furnishes at least one-tenth of the pack of the United States.

In the season of 1902 Maryland packed of this commodity alone over 4,000,000 cases of an average standard size of No. 3 cans, 2 dozen to the case, making a grand total of over 96,000,000 cans.

If Maryland furnished 25 per cent of the pack of this country in 1894, as claimed, and as statistics seem to show, and has increased 40 per cent since, then the pack of all the commodities in the State of Maryland to-day should be at least 245,000,000 cans. So far as canning fruit and vegetables is concerned, Maryland has made a gratifying increase in variety, quantity, and quality.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration proposes to impose upon this great industry, not only in the State of Maryland, but in every other State and Territory of this country, a hardship and blow that is not only detrimental to the packer, but is also an absolute injury to the farmer who grows the crop and the consumer alike, without being a particle of benefit to anybody, as intended by this bill—namely, protecting the purity thereof and the quantity the can contains.

The weight of canned fruits and vegetables would not necessarily have anything to do with the purity or impurity of the goods. In other words, canned fruits and vegetables are about on a parity with water, as far as weight is concerned, and a can of water would weigh about the same as a can of vegetables packed as solidly as is possible with the vegetable matter as grown (the skin and cores being removed), the cans being the same size; and especially is this so of tomatoes and most other packable agricultural and horticultural products. The tomato, for instance, is made up of cells and globules whose chief component parts are water; hence the greatest care is exercised by the practical, up-to-date canner, in order that the tomato may be crushed as little as possible consistent with the required and necessary rapidity in handling and packing, for the more the vegetable or fruit is crushed the less solid and more watery it appears.

Tomatoes honestly packed and subjected to severe freeze would deteriorate in appearance, and upon being opened they would have a ragged, spongy look, and be much more watery, but would not be affected thereby as to weight. This might happen after the goods had passed the packer and even the jobber and while in the hands of the retailer, and would simply be no fault of the packer. The provisions of clause 3 of section 7 of this bill are entirely impracticable so far as canned goods are concerned, and would benefit no one, but would render a successful management of the canning business almost impossible. In the first place, the weight of the solid material put into cans does not always mean the quality. For instance, some fruits, such as strawberries, peaches, and, in fact, we might say all fruits and tomatoes, if they happen to be a little soft when put into cans, would not "cut out," in technical phrase, after processing in so good a condition, and would not be so valuable to the customer as if a lesser weight of fruit that was in a firmer condition had been put into the cans. And, as I have said before, some articles are made up of a greater percentage of water, and although the can was packed full of the solid material and nothing else was put into it, yet after processing there would be quite a percentage of water or juice in the can, which must vary from day to day, and no living man could put on his label what weight or measure of solid material is contained in the can. He might weigh into a can 32 ounces of tomatoes, and then after processing and opening the can the solid tomato, when poured out and the liquor drained off, might weigh anywhere from 18 to 26 ounces, and if squeezed a little would still keep emitting juice and might go down to 15 or even 14 ounces. It would all depend upon the condition of the fruit.

Other articles would be affected in a similar manner, and I respectfully submit to you that the proposed law would be asking the packers to do something that would be absolutely impossible. Honest canners have no objection to a pure-food law if it guarantees to the consumer what its name implies, but this section would not accomplish that result, and its adoption would be a serious handicap to one of the most important industries in this country. Every honest canner and packer would welcome any practicable law that would protect and guarantee the purity of the article and the honesty of the pack, but they do not want a law that practically cripples one of the greatest industries in this country, and places additional cost on the already overburdened consumer in the purchase of many of the necessaries of life, and that without a particle of benefit to anyone in any conceivable way. Such a "tariff" would not even benefit a trust.

Canned goods as packed in Maryland—or anywhere else, so far as I know—are not sold on a weight or measure basis. The tin cans in which the goods are packed are properly known by numbers; for instance, tomatoes are packed in No. 3 Maryland standards and in No. 3 Jersey standards and in No. 10 standards, the latter for use in large quantities. Peas and corn are usually packed in No. 2 cans, though sometimes when packed for large consumers—hotel and restaurant trade—they are put in No. 10 cans; and this is the case with other Maryland-packed products, and I presume it is the rule throughout the country; and the can itself, seen by the consumer, is sufficient evidence of its capacity, sale being made at a convenient retail price per can. Just here, too, I wish to speak of preserves, jellies, and jams, packed in glass jars, which is also a great industry in Baltimore city and elsewhere in the country. The manufacture of glassware is not such a fine and exact art that the glass manufacturers can produce vessels of equal and uniform capacity, and each container would have to be weighed and marked separately as to weight and measure, under this bill, before it is filled as well as after, or the packers would be constantly laying themselves liable for statements which, in the nature of things, would be a technical violation of the proposed law. I am credibly informed that variations occur in weight or measure from evaporation and consequent shrinkage. A statement might be correct when made and incorrect six months later.

The case as it stands in the nine agricultural counties of the First district of Maryland, Mr. Chairman, is simply this: Our farmers depend largely, in most sections, upon the canneries for disposing of the products of the soil which I have already referred to as finding a natural home in Maryland; in the canneries our laboring people find well-paid work for a considerable period of the year; the value of canning property is a factor in the taxable basis; for material and labor the packers annually distribute large sums of money in the towns and rural communities, which is spent at home and stimulates all branches of industry, and upon the operation of the packing houses depends, to a great degree, the progress and prosperity of my district, as of other districts in my State and in two score of States in this Union. If the packer is putting on the market a 3-pound can, say, of tomatoes, and selling it through the broker or middleman to the consumer for a 3-pound can, and it is short in weight, there might be some excuse for requiring him to go to the expense and inconvenience of branding each separate can; but he does not do this. He packs a No. 3 can and two dozen of these are put in a wooden case and this case is marked "Two dozen No. 3 Maryland standard," or "New Jersey standard," as the case may be. Why should his business, now conducted under fixed and recognized methods, be suddenly revolutionized and every detail of it be required to be readjusted, because the groceryman and the department store advertise 3-pound cans that are not 3-pound cans? Certainly no fraud or dishonesty has been imputed to the packer. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] were he familiar with the packing business would not lay such stress upon the varying sizes of No. 3 cans. The Maryland No. 3 is as uniform as it can be made. The Jersey No. 3 is slightly larger and is also as uniform as can be made. The dealer who retails canned goods knows that when he buys No. 3 Maryland he is getting a can that holds, of tomatoes, an average of about 40 ounces; and should a packer not give honest weight, and should his No. 3 Maryland or his No. 3 Jersey—and I use these standards because they are the ones most generally followed in the East—not come up to the standard for which he sells them, the inexorable laws of trade would doubtless punish him by making it impossible for him to get the market price for No. 3 cans. As the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GILL] has said, Congress has never fixed a standard of weights and measures, and the entire effect of this part of the pure-food bill will simply result in damage and confusion to the canned-goods industry, without, so far as I can see, any benefit whatever to the consumer. Should it be enacted into law, the increase in cost of canned goods to the consumer will be considerable, and we all know he will have it to pay.

The law would tend to destroy the value of individual labels and packages which now have a recognized standing among consumers, and the copyright of special designs now possessing a large monetary value would be destroyed without any corresponding benefit to either manufacturer or consumer. Such a provision is not properly a part of a pure-food law, so far as it concerns the canning industry, for which I speak, and is unnecessary, as the goods are sold at a given price per can or container, and not by weight or bulk, nor is any claim made for weight or bulk. The language of subdivision 4 (page 21) of the bill in itself fully protects the purchaser from fraud or deception in all respects, weight and measure included, by prohibiting any labels false or misleading in any particular.

I want to say in regard to labels that every provident canner has already purchased his labels for this season's pack, at least, and it is frequently twelve or eighteen months before his goods are all out of his possession, hence at the proper time I shall offer an amendment to the provision in section 16, so far as it may pertain to canned fruits and vegetables.

Now, let us return to the canned goods themselves. In so far as it relates to purchase and sale, the goods are neither sold nor bought by weight or measure, and the only thing that does enter vitally into the purchase or sale is the number of the can and the quality of the goods. The cans, being standard sizes and as nearly uniform as it is possible to make them, show for themselves as to quantity of contents, and samples are opened by the salesman or broker and quality exposed to the purchaser by dumping or otherwise, examination being thoroughly made by him, and the sale is conditioned upon the fact that the bulk lot when received shall open up and be fully as good as the sample by which purchase was made, a part of the original sample being retained by the broker and purchaser for comparison and decision. Hence you can readily see that the marks upon the goods have no part whatever in the sale as to quality or quantity, and a fairer way of doing business between the purchaser and the dealer, and hence the retailer and consumer, could not be conceived; and since there is no benefit to be derived by the packer, dealer, or consumer by the operation of subsection 3 of section 7 of the bill, and since it would entail an increased price to the consumer and a useless added expense to the packer, as well as a practical paralysis of a legitimate business, and no good of any kind or character can possibly be produced by it, I will ask that lines 3, 4, and 5, on page 21, be stricken from the bill. [Loud applause.]

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the able and exhaustive argument of my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], last evening completely covered the whole field and represented the views of the majority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce upon the importance and scope and detail of this legislation.

But there are a few facts of general importance which, in this connection, should be a matter of record.

It is recognized now that the welfare of people and their ability to accomplish something for themselves and their families and for the public depends, for a very large extent, upon proper nutrition for their bodies. The experience of this Government in the Tropics, in the Philippines, in Porto Rico, Cuba, and Panama shows conclusively that as soon as men can secure proper food in sufficient quantities they are capable of doing much more and efficient work and become far better and more valuable citizens. But it is needless to go to the Tropics to ascertain the truth of such a self-evident fact. One great source of the incapacity, poverty, suffering, and degradation in our own land, in both cities and country, has been the imperfect nutrition of body and brain, caused by deficient quality or quantity of foods.

Nearly all the civilized governments realize this fact, and have enacted laws, more or less stringent, designed to correct, so far as possible, the evils of this adulteration and deterioration of foods. The majority of the States in the Union have laws, more or less wise, and more or less well enforced. About twenty-five States of the Union have good laws, very well enforced, which have been productive of untold benefits to the people. If all of the States had good pure-food laws, well administered, and adapted to the varying conditions of their localities, there would be little need for a national pure-food law for interstate commerce. But it is because there are so many States which have no laws at all, or are not enforcing the laws they do have wisely and efficiently, and there is such a woeful lack of uniformity and protection to the people and to the business interests that it now seems to be necessary that Congress should exercise its power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution for the purpose of protecting all of our people against the admitted and manifest dangers of adulterated and misbranded foods and drugs.

The State authorities themselves, the food departments of many State governments, have urged the enactment of this legislation. The great business interests of the country—manufacturing, jobbing, and retail—have urged it strongly for their own protection, while the great mass of consumers seem to look for relief to the Federal Government more than to their local authorities for protection from conditions and evils as to food products. This situation may be unfortunate under our form of government, but it exists, and we have to meet it.

The present legislation is not designed to supplant any State legislation on the subject of pure food, but to supplement it and make it the more effective. The State authorities desire it, first of all, because it can enable them by cooperation to reach the principal offender, who is generally some powerful manufacturer outside of the State. The business interests desire it, because it will tend to produce a uniformity of standard foods, of preparation and distribution, and will tend toward uniformity of method and practices in the laws themselves and in their administration.

The pending legislation will tend to encourage honesty and fair dealing in the great mass of food products and discourage the fraud and swindling which has not only tended to impoverish the masses of our people, but to threaten their lives, health, and happiness. Under existing conditions a national pure-food law will inspire confidence among producers and consumers, and this will improve methods, encourage development along proper lines, and decrease prices of good foods to consumers.

Unless one has examined the matter he will not appreciate the immensity of the interests affected by this legislation. The United States census for 1900 shows there were 16,187,715 families in the United States, and by the increase of population during the last six years there has doubtless been a proportionate increase of families, so there must now be at least 18,500,000 families in the United States. The average income per family in this country is estimated at something over $500 per annum, and nine-tenths of the families spend about three-fifths of their annual income for food and drink. Conservatively estimated on this and other bases, it is fair to assume that fully $6,000,000,000 is expended in this country every year for foods, as defined in this bill.

The census of 1900 also shows that there was annually produced at that time of manufactured foods $2,273,880,879, and of liquors and beverages $425,504,167; total, $2,699,385,041.

The vast increase of all of these industries during the last six years would probably now disclose an annual production of at least $3,500,000,000. This does not include drugs or animal foods, also affected by this bill, whose production will also aggregate many millions of dollars. The popular notion as to the vast extent of fraud and adulterations in foods is not sustained by the facts. A fair estimate would be that not over one-fourth to one-fifth of the food products are susceptible of being so treated, so that probably a billion and a half dollars of annual production would come within the province of adulteration. There will be inserted in the RECORD some of the articles found to be most adulterated by the official food chemists of the various States. Competent authorities have estimated the pecuniary losses to consumers caused by adulteration, but the calculation has never been very satisfactory. They vary from minimum of $150,000,000 to a maximum of $500,000,000 per annum.

It seems to be fairly safe to assume that if the provisions of this bill can tend to produce the good results hoped for it and bring about uniformity of laws and administration between the Federal Government and the States, and also bring about an improvement and economy of methods and development among the business interests affected, that there can be an annual benefit to the people of at least $300,000,000.

This shows the great importance of this measure and why there has been such an insistent demand for it among our people. As I have before stated, the amount of harmful adulterations of food has been exaggerated, but, at the same time, the situation is very aggravating. The official reports show that it has ranged from an estimate of 26 per cent in some States to fully 70 per cent in other places, depending upon the amount of consumption and also on a proper enforcement of the local law. A fair estimate is that from 40 to 50 per cent of products which can be adulterated are so treated in the country as a whole and would be affected by the provisions of this act; so the results of this legislation may not only save $300,000,000 or more to our people, but, more important still, preserve their health, increase their capacity for enjoyment, for labor, and good work in public and private life.

In the limited time allotted to me I only wish to particularly discuss one paragraph, which has excited much interest on this floor, and that is the package provision, so called, being the third paragraph on page 21 of the House amendment. The members of this committee all realize, from the scope of this discussion, the many troubles which the Interstate Commerce Committee have had in the preparation and discussion of this bill. We have been overwhelmed with all sorts of advice; and the one thing which has astonished us is this—the unanimity of the one opinion—that everybody is strongly in favor of a proper pure-food bill. Everybody has favored the enactment of some proper measure. The singular feature to which I wish to call your attention in connection with this remarkable unanimity is that nearly everyone has a little amendment which he knows will greatly improve the bill and which generally excepts from the operaton of the act the particular business or product in which he is interested. The vender of rotten eggs was strongly in favor of a pure-food bill, but he wanted an amendment excluding his business. The gentleman who manufactured Jamaica ginger out of wood alcohol was in favor of a pure-food bill, but he wanted an amendment excluding his business. The gentlemen who make adulterated pepper all favor a pure-food bill, but they want an amendment excluding their business.

The gentlemen who manufacture catarrh cures with cocaine and like substances, or who manufacture cough cures with opium and morphine, or who vend stomach cures or bitters or various nostrums with percentage of pure alcohol in them far greater than is contained in good whisky—all of these reputable gentlemen are very loudly in favor of a proper pure-food bill, but they all want a little amendment which shall not affect their particular business.

The gentlemen also who sell short-weight canned goods as full-weight product all favor a pure-food bill, but like the rest of them they want an amendment excluding their business. It is the same with nearly everyone in connection with this legislation. Your committee was confronted with this sort of condition. From the nature of the subject-matter this bill is necessarily divided into two entirely distinct and different divisions. One has reference to adulteration, the other has reference to misbranding. The gentleman from Illinois told you truly that the amount of adulteration of foods in the United States was not as large as many people imagined. It is decreasing somewhat in proportion to what it used to be on account of the rigid enforcement of wise pure-food laws in many of the States. But the amount of misbranding, of cheating, of swindling by means of imitation foods, by means of fraudulently prepared foods, by means of short-weight preparation, by means of various devices compelled by competition, is increasing in the United States; and if there is one thing which needs legislation, it is upon that evil which is constantly increasing.

We find this condition, too, in reference to the preparation of foods: There is a revolution in the manufacture and distribution of foods for consumption. Many foods which were formerly sold in bulk are now sold in prepared packages. Many people prefer it in that way, and the manufacturer certainly does. It is prepared cheaper and better in some respects. It comes to the consumer cleaner and fresher in some respects. It is certainly very convenient and attractive and worthy of encouragement. So that there is great competition between the bulk products and the package products.

Now, the package products are prepared by large concerns, having ample capital, able to push their business, having great skill, and they are able to do to the best advantage that which is necessary to prepare their products for the market. We have received many circulars from these manufacturers of the various products; and it is a little unfortunate for them that they do not agree. The Western Canners' Association send us a circular which was alluded to by the gentleman from Illinois, in which they stated that the cans were prepared as one-pound regular, one pound tall, one pound and a half, etc.—not that such was or would be the contents of the can, but that such was the trade name. Others have sent us circulars in which they stated that cans were prepared by standard sizes, that the sizes were numbered 1, 2, and so forth; showing that there is a vital difference between them as to the names or terms they use in describing the size of the cans. But no matter what they call the cans, none of them hold the weight of goods to which the term of weight is affixed.

Now, as a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, these cans are not prepared in pound sizes or in any size which will hold the amount of the product which the trade term designates. The circular which was sent to us by the canners' association states the fact that they do use cans of various sizes which they call pound cans, but as a fact can not contain that amount of goods. It is absolutely impossible to find a can known as No. 1 pound regular, prepared for fruit and vegetables which will hold a pound of prepared fruit or vegetables. Any statement that such is a pound can is a false statement; and yet these canners notify this House that they desire the privilege of sending that can out in the market and hold it before the public as one-pound can, which never was made for a one-pound can, and can not hold a pound of any kind of fruit or vegetables. Now, what do they actually do? As a fact, they prepare it as a standard can, containing less than a pound, yet they call it a pound can and it is sold to the public as a pound can. You examine the newspapers of this country; you take any daily paper in any State in the Union; you examine any weekly paper, and look at the advertisements of some of the grocers, and especially of the grocery department of the great department stores in the largest cities and the catalogues of the great supply houses and you will find that the majority of the advertisements are of package products described to be sold by weight and measure, and nearly every single description is misleading, is a deception to the public, because the public does not get the amount set forth in the advertisement.

Mr. TALBOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. TALBOTT. Are these advertisements inserted by the canner or the dealer?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Of course they are inserted by the local dealer. Our point is this: The canners want the privilege to prepare these cans and sell them by weight, as pound cans. They ask the privilege of selling them as pound cans, when, as a matter of fact, they are not pound cans. And the principal reason for this deception is that by such means they can better supplant the bulk products which the consumer might in some cases use if he thought he was getting a full weight.

Mr. MANN. This circular that you have there was not gotten out by a dealer.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. This circular was prepared by the Western Canned Goods Association and sent to us over the signature of its officers. In it they ask the privilege of preparing what they term a pound can, which is not a pound can, and the privilege of selling it to retail dealers, who will advertise to the public that the goods are pound cans, when as a matter of fact they are not. Now, that practice is increasing in this country. That is the way these package men are trying to extend their business in competition with the bulk trade. Now, we have no right to discriminate as between the package men on the one side and the bulk people on the other. All we want to do is to require that each one tell the truth—tell the people just exactly what their goods are, no more and no less.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. May I ask my colleague a question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. If a can is made which for a certain product would be a 1-pound can, would it be a 1-pound can for another kind of product?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Probably not; but I will come to that in a moment. Now, the committee amendment simply provides that goods shall be sold by weight or measure of the contents of the can (and now comes the point that is important to the canners), provided that the board of secretaries designated in the bill shall have authority to make regulations concerning the standard sizes of these cans; and all that is necessary then to be labeled on the can is the standard size that it actually purports to be, so that a standard size No. 1 shall be labeled "Standard size No. 1," and shall not be labeled a 1-pound can.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the gentleman if it is the theory of the committee that by virtue of this provision of the bill this board of secretaries, as you call them, will make a definite stipulation by rule as to the exact contents that shall be contained in these different sizes?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will tell the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. And if that is the theory, why would it not be a good idea so to state in the law itself, so that there may be no possibility of a misunderstanding?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I hardly believe it is necessary to set forth all the details in the bill. It would be embarrassing by making too rigid rules for a matter which may need to be changed from time to time; but according to our idea they would work out something along this line: All of these package manufacturers, or nearly all of them, are organized into different associations. This one is the Western Packers' Canned Goods Association. Thirteen or fourteen States are represented in this association. These powerful organizations would agree upon a standard size can, a No. 1 can, containing so many cubic inches, or such a weight of water, and so forth; a No. 2 can, holding so many cubic inches or such a capacity, and a No. 3 can with a certain described capacity, and so on. Those would be the standard-size cans—one set for tomatoes, another for peaches, another for berries, and so forth. That is what is really done now, but if provided by law would accomplish two things: First, that a standard-size can could not be sold as a pound can, and when people called for a pound can or saw one advertised as a pound can, the chances are it would be one instead of a can 25 per cent short of such weight, and if a can was not sold as a pound can, everyone would gradually learn it was a standard-size can and would buy it for what it actually was. That would prevent fraud and swindling by the advertisements of the department stores and catalogue houses and those box-car merchants in our Western States.

Again, that standard-can size could not be cut down, could not be diminished, as is now so often done, without violating the law. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday showed you, and you can see for yourselves right there, that there are different sizes of these cans of any one standard, and that difference in size is increasing, because the temptation to cheat is increasing. That is, the increased competition tends to diminish the size of the can, as many reputable dealers are forced to provide the two sizes—standard size and diminished size—in order to hold their trade. So there is a constant opportunity and almost a necessity sometimes in holding or building up a trade for diminishing the size of the can, and thus meeting an unscrupulous competitor and engage with him in deluding the public. You may take a No. 3 can for an article in one place and compare it with a No. 3 can in another place and you will find a considerable difference in the sizes of those cans.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the gentleman that I am not asking the question with a view to criticising——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I understand that. I am very glad to give the gentleman the information.

Mr. NORRIS. I want the information, and am only seeking light. This agreement between the different manufacturers of cans would have no legal effect until approved by this board of secretaries.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The views of the manufacturers or dealers would have no effect except advisory. Any legal rule would have to be promulgated by this board—made a formal regulation by them. Such a rule would be the action of the board, and hence a law of Congress, but these things are always done upon consultation with the trade which is affected by them.

Mr. NORRIS. Under this bill now, would there be any way by which the dealer or manufacturer of cans who did not want to make any such agreement could go on just as he pleased?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Certainly. We do not undertake to restrict him, except he must not sell an undersized can for a standard can or a pound can.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, but by the use of this word he would not need to come clear up to the standard, would he?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I am glad the gentleman has spoken of that, for I want to explain. I am responsible, I suppose, for the insertion of that word "approximate." Some word like that was necessary in the bill in reference to weight and measure, not as to size of package. We have been criticised because we left the door wide open. To my mind it was disclosed last evening by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Massachusetts that a slight difference in weight necessarily occurs in packing and preparing these cans and packages. Now, that slight and natural difference in weight is met by the word "approximate." This word, as used in the committee amendment, only refers to weight and measure and not to the size of the package. Approximate would be defined in the dictionary and, I think, by the court and jury as the nearest possible under the circumstances. That leaves a small latitude, where a latitude is necessary. If we attempt to make a rigid standard, it would burden, it would greatly injure, the packing business of the country. We have no desire to do that, but, on the contrary, desire to help it. What we want to do is to make an elastic system which will not injure anybody, that will accomplish something, and that will fix some standard; that will encourage the honest dealer to set forth exactly what he has, since he knows that the honest man can not then unfairly compete by surreptitiously diminishing the size of the packages.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Does the gentleman admit that it is left to the jury and the judge in each particular instance to say whether the law has been violated or not?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Under the Constitution that is the only thing we can do.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That is the very thing you can't do. Take a case that occurred in my city——

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. My time is limited to twenty minutes, and I can not allow the gentleman to consume it.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The supreme court of my State say that leaving it to the jury to say whether or not the law has been violated makes the law unconstitutional.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I do not see how it can be escaped that no man can be convicted of violating any law except by a trial at law. But that is not this case. We lay down the law, we provide that a package shall have such a weight, which shall be fixed upon it, with a certain exception, and we provide that there may be a little necessary variation.

The inspector only ascertains whether the law has probably been violated, and it is his business to try and enforce the law as passed by Congress. Under the Constitution the only way a man can be tried for violating the law is by the court. If the inspector thinks your man has violated the law, he brings him before a court and the court decides whether the man has violated the law. If it decides he has not, that settles it, and he is discharged. If it decides that he has violated the law, it finds him guilty, and that settles it. Whether we did or not have the word "approximate" in this paragraph, it must be for the court to determine whether the man had violated the law.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman pardon just one question?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield for a question.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. We have a Jew butcher in my town, and the inspector comes along and says: "You have got too much of a certain acid in that sausage, and you are a criminal." The next inspector comes along and inspects precisely the same sausage, and says: "You have not got too much in there, and it is not a violation of the law." So he is a criminal one day for selling certain sausage, and he is not a criminal the next day for selling precisely the same sausage.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Oh, Mr. Chairman, that does not meet the situation at all. The man is not a criminal until the law by its constitutional processes adjudges him a criminal. The inspector can't do that; he can only bring him before the court.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Let me ask the gentleman would the canner have a choice of one of three things—to state on the package the approximate weight in the first place, the approximate quantity in the second place, or to use a standard can in the third place?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; that is the situation exactly.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to make a suggestion to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. It is not the court which decides whether your can is approximately up to the standard. If it were the court you would have the same decision in each case, but it is the jury which settles whether the can is "approximate" or not. As I followed the gentleman from Illinois here yesterday, he had several cans which he exhibited to us which would not balance each other on the scales, and from which he argued that there had been a fraud, because instead of being a 3-pound can, it only weighed 2 pounds and ten and a half ounces. Now, there is not one of these cans that the jury would not say was approximately of that weight, and that illustrates the danger of your standard in that connection, whereas if you provide that the cans should be of the same size, you have a definite test from which nothing can depart. If you provide that the can, whatever it is, shall contain not less than a certain amount you have a minimum standard.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. These cans are not designed to be made by weight, but by size, and that is exactly what this paragraph provides shall be done, but the trouble is that the canners and these dealers desire to sell a size can as a weight can. That we desire to forbid, but we believed it necessary that in their weight and measure packages we should provide that there may be allowed to be a slight difference on account of natural and unavoidable difficulties. If they attempt to make and sell a can by weight, there necessarily must be left a little leeway, so to prevent opportunities for blackmail of honest men, which might come from too strict a rule as to such matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation that I even undertake to assert my right as a Member and to get into this debate at all. Legal subtleties have been dealt in by members of the learned profession to such an extent that I think they have confused the minds and obscured the thinking of certain gentlemen whom I have always esteemed learned men. I shall devote myself to the consideration of this question from the point of view of one of the common people, as a Representative of the common people, who wants to be neither swindled nor poisoned.

The country and the Congress have just gone through a period of hysteria provoked by a fiction writer's description of what he saw in Chicago. Those days of excitement were marked by reports from a special committee sent out to Chicago by the President, by messages from the President to Congress, and by letters to individual Members of Congress, as well as by broadsides of hot indignation from the newspapers. The House fairly fell over itself in its anxiety to yield to a clamoring constituency as broad as the country. Legislation on new lines, and drastic to a degree, was put through this body by an almost unanimous vote. We were determined, at all hazards, to protect the meat-eating public from the chance of contaminated food. Now, we have another opportunity, on the same general line of legislation, to protect the people, and Members of this House who voted for that bill balk at this. I fail to see why.

I believe that it is susceptible of proof that for every case of ptomaine poisoning caused by the eating of unclean meat there have been a hundred or more cases of poisoning and death from the use of hurtful drugs masquerading as harmless remedies for disease. No man who ever ate tainted meat willingly returns to it. It is so repulsive that it can not get to be a habit. But many drugs that destroy the moral sense and enslave the bodies and minds of men are eagerly sought for after they have been tried a few times. The people will avoid unclean meat as pestilence, but once they have the habit men who otherwise are truthful and honest will lie and steal to gratify their debased appetites for drugs. The horror of this drug situation is that unfortunates who are ill, or fancy they are, unwittingly get into habits that bring misery to themselves and ruin to their families.

There seems to be a poison adapted to every age, sex, and condition. There are soothing sirups that poison the infant and make opium fiends out of babies in arms. There are alcoholic beverages in the guise of medicines for women's diseases, the use of which, it has been proven, have had a prenatal influence for evil. Drunkards and drug fiends have been made during the period of gestation by mothers too stupid to comprehend the effect of their habits.

Men who would scorn a toddy and can not be persuaded by a pleasing compound of mint and other things, honestly and frankly presented, will surrender to "bitters" that are recommended for the stomach's sake.

If one may believe what he sees in the portrait gallery of the newspapers, those Members of Congress who have not been restored by somebody's celery compound have been rejuvenated by Peruna. Indeed Peruna seems to be the favorite Congressional drink. [Laughter and applause.] I happen to know that it is also a favorite prescription in certain prohibition sections. The fact that it makes men drunk quickly, violently, and sometimes viciously has not hurt its standing as a family medicine.

Mr. Chairman, in common fairness to this medicine, or this drink, whatever it may be, that I have just referred to, I think I ought to tell the House the only good thing I ever heard of it. Last summer in Texas on a railway train one day I overheard a conversation between two gentleman who had met, who were friends. It seems that one of them resided under the same roof with his mother-in-law, and the dove of peace had not always roosted on that rooftree. His friend knew that, and when he came up, after making the usual inquiries as to his health, he asked him how things were going in the domestic line. The other replied, "Oh, fine, fine! I introduced the old lady to Peruna two months ago, and she has been drunk and happy ever since." [Prolonged laughter and applause.]

It is notorious, Mr. Chairman, that the opposition to this measure is largely controlled, inspired, and directed by a tremendous lobby representing the manufacturers of so-called "patent or proprietary medicines." It was stated by Mr. Adams a writer in Collier's Magazine, in that remarkable series of articles which he printed last year, and which did more, in my judgment, to advance this very much to be desired reform than the work of any other single man in the country, that that association had between thirty and fifty millions of dollars to spend each year in protecting the rights of the people who make it, to protect the rights of the people who belong to the association to poison the people of this country, and to make drunkards out of those dupes who thought they were taking harmless drugs. Whether those figures are correct or not, I do not know, but it is evident, Mr. Chairman, to every man who has studied the course of this legislation that there has been somewhere back in the dark a tremendous power which has been able to stay the hands of the reformer time and time again, when the people were demanding protection to their health and their bodies and their minds and seemed on the point of getting it. Somewhere back of it all there has been a power that seemed irresistible.

Mr. Chairman, what will be the effect of this bill, and what is its purpose? I believe that it will promote honesty in trade, which is certainly desirable, and cultivate the habit of telling the truth, which, I take it, is equally desirable. It will not deny men the privilege of getting drunk on bitters, if they choose to do so; but it does say that they shall not be deceived into intoxication in the belief that they are taking harmless medicines. It will not take away from the cocaine or opium victim the privilege of his poison, but it does say that a man not addicted to these drugs shall not be seduced into the habit unknowingly. It does not even deny those who have a taste for such things the right to buy adulterated foods and drinks, but it does say that those who prefer honest food and drink shall not be swindled with adulterants nor poisoned without knowing it by an article of interstate commerce.

And that reminds me, Mr. Chairman, that there are gentlemen in this body who are concerned because they think this bill, if it should become a law, will trespass upon the rights of the States. They do not believe that section 12, which expressly disavows any intention by the act to infringe the prerogatives of the States, is a sufficient guaranty. I can not agree with that view. The Constitution gives to Congress the right to regulate commerce between the States, and if adulterated food or drink made in Chicago and shipped to Texas is not interstate commerce I would like to know what it is. But, sir, even if we should make a mistake in this matter, which we don't want to do and don't think we are doing, the question is sure to be raised and carried to the Supreme Court, and that body, I think, can be relied upon to set the matter right.

My colleague [Mr. HENRY of Texas] this morning stated that it was not popular to refer to the decisions of the Supreme Court, and then did so, and showed that the Supreme Court had protected the constitutional rights of the States. I had hoped to have time to say a little something further about his argument, but my time is about exhausted, and I can only remind my colleague, for whose character and judgment and knowledge of the law I have profound respect, that that court is still doing business, and its doors wide open to litigants, and that every right of the individual or of the Commonwealth of Texas can be determined there.

I am as jealous of the rights of my State as any man can be, but I am even more jealous of the rights of the individuals who compose the State. One of the rights, one of the dearest and most valued rights, of the individual is not to be poisoned or swindled by some knave who resides in another Commonwealth. I want to be protected against the conscienceless greed of the rascal who sells poison under the label of health-giving drugs.

I think I heard the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] say yesterday that since this agitation began there has been an appreciable decrease in the adulteration of food. It was a cheering piece of information, and I hope that it is merely the beginning of a great reform. I have observed from time to time advertisements in the newspapers in which great stress was laid on the fact that the commodity offered for sale was pure. If we pass this bill, I believe that in a very few months the newspapers will all be full of advertisements of good, honest, sound, and wholesome articles of food and drink. I do not believe that the newspapers will eventually lose anything by the expulsion of the nostrums from their columns, and I know that the people will be gainers. [Applause.]

I heard it stated yesterday that olive oil was adulterated by mixing with it a percentage of cotton oil. Some gentlemen from the South may incline to the view that it will hurt one of our great industries if these blenders of the two vegetable oils are forced to quit their lying claim that it is all pure olive oil. I can not take that view. Cotton-seed oil is an honest, wholesome product and has merit enough to stand on its own inherent worth. Certainly we ought not to foster the trade by telling lies about it. It should be sold for what it is, and if as good as we think it is, it will soon be established on a higher plane as a food product than it has ever had and will command a better price. But whether it is or not, I want to see square dealing in food and drink, and for more than 200,000 Texans I declare here and now that we want no trade based on dishonesty in weight, measure, or quality. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WALLACE. Within less than a week I heard a scientific gentleman under oath say that cotton-seed oil was a fair substitute for olive oil.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has seventeen minutes, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has sixteen minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, before yielding the remaining portion of my time I wish to make a statement. My colleague, Mr. BARTLETT, of Georgia, is absent. He is very seldom absent from this House, and the House knows the reasons of his absence now, that it is to attend the funeral of a deceased colleague. I do not myself remember when he has been absent before. He requested me to ask the House, if he did not return, permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Before closing the general debate I wish to modify that request a little, and I now request that in the event he returns during the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule he may be permitted to deliver his remarks, and that otherwise he be permitted to extend them in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make his request at this time. If the gentleman from Georgia returns during the course of the five-minute debate at a time when it would be possible to accommodate him, I think there would be no doubt about giving him the time; but the House might not wish to make an agreement to give him the time now and then have him consume the last half hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Georgia that he make this request during the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is perfectly satisfactory to me, but I thought before closing general debate I ought to call attention to the matter. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. RYAN] such time as I have left.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I favor the enactment of a pure-food law. I will not enter into a discussion of all of the provisions of this bill, as it has been ably presented to the House by the gentlemen who have preceded me. There is a demand for this legislation. The recent discussion, by the press of the country, brought about by the investigations of the packing industry in Chicago and elsewhere have aggravated the demand. The people are demanding pure food. They are demanding that articles of food shall be correctly labeled and that Congress prevent, by the enactment of this bill, the adulteration or misbranding of foods or drugs.

In order to fully carry out the purposes of this bill it is hoped that the different States of the Union will enact laws to conform with the Federal laws, and thus fully protect the people of this country from the dishonest manufacturers of foods and drugs.

Mr. Chairman, after the decision of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to place a more drastic provision in section 7 of the bill in relation to the labeling of medicines or drugs containing any poisonous substances than originally decided upon, I communicated with the manufacturers of proprietary medicines in Buffalo, N. Y., and I received, among others, a reply from Mr. D. E. Foster, of Foster, Milburn & Co. It is so different from most letters received by Members of Congress under similar circumstances that I will insert it in my remarks. The letter is as follows:

BUFFALO, N. Y., June 21, 1906.

Hon. W. H. RYAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RYAN: Your message advising us as to what your committee had cut out of the Lovering amendment was duly received.

We thank you very much for your kindness in this matter. We believe your committee acted on their best judgment and conscientiously in cutting out of the Lovering amendment "opium" and "morphine," and of course it is useless for us to make any comment.

We might say, however, after all these years of brain work you have put in while at Washington, if you do pass the pure-food bill it will certainly be a great relief to you and entitle you to a holiday. The writer is just starting on a fishing trip about 400 miles north of Toronto, away up in the Canadian forests.

Mercy sake, Mr. RYAN, what fun I shall have compared with the hard work you are putting in in Washington trying to please everybody and in the end get nothing but "cusses."

Thanking you again for your kindness, we remain,

Yours, very truly,

FOSTER MILBURN CO.
D. E. FOSTER, Prest.

Mr. Chairman, I will now discuss briefly the provisions of the bill relating to whisky, referred to by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]. A few words concerning the origin of whisky may aid somewhat to a clearer conception of the subject. Even the name itself is not devoid of interest.

EARLY HISTORY OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

It is quite probable that the knowledge of distilled spirits corresponding somewhat closely to whisky was known to the ancient Egyptians. When the Arabians overran Egypt they acquired, among other useful information concerning the Egyptian arts and sciences, the knowledge of the art of manufacturing distilled spirits from sprouted grain. This knowledge they carried back with them to their academies in Spain, from whence it spread over Europe. The introduction of the art of making whisky into Ireland has been traced to the ancient Phoenician traders. When the English invaded Ireland they found the manufacture of whisky a well-understood art, carried on as a household operation by the inhabitants. The Irish called the spirit they distilled "Uisque beatha." This name itself smacks of the aims and traditions of those ancient alchemists who were seeking the water or elixir of life. "Uisque beatha" means water of life. This term was corrupted by the English into "Uisquebaugh." Finally the last syllable was altogether dropped, thus shortening the name into "uisque," or whisky, as it is now spelled.

Distillation was practiced a thousand years before the term "whisky" originated.

When the term "whisky" was first used it was applied exclusively to distilled spirits made from grain which had been purified and refined as much as the primitive methods then known could accomplish purification, and to which coloring and flavoring matters were added.

All products of distillation which are entitled to be called "whisky" have had coloring and flavoring added to them in one way or another.

The so-called "straight whisky" of to-day is a distillate from grain which has been partially rectified, purified, and refined and which is put into a barrel especially prepared to give it both coloring and flavoring.

If any law is to exclude the addition of coloring and flavoring from so-called "blends," then it should also exclude all processes intended to give coloring and flavoring to so-called "straight whiskies."

Distillation alone does not produce whisky, and therefore a distiller, as such, does not produce whisky.

It is what is done to a distilled spirit after distillation that determines whether it is entitled to be called whisky or not.

The gentleman from Alabama states that at the proper time he will move to strike out the proviso beginning on line 22 and ending on line 25, page 21, or to strike out the words "not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients."

I believe that I will show that the distiller obtains his flavor, in part, by a mixture of grains before fermentation and from the charred barrel. The blender obtains his flavor by a mixture of whiskies after distillation.

NOW AS TO COMPOUNDED OR BLENDED WHISKY.

A compounded or blended whisky is neither an imitation nor a spurious whisky if sold merely as whisky, and it becomes spurious or an imitation only if sold under some other trade name in connection with the word "whisky." This construction was placed upon this section in 1869, when it was enacted.

The words "spurious," "imitation," or "compound" liquor are used in the statute in the disjunctive and not in the conjunctive; but if there were any doubt as to whether they were used as synonymous terms, it would be disssipated by a contemporaneous departmental construction of the law which was made by the then Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Delano, under date of September 16, 1869, which may be found in Volume X, Internal-Revenue Record, page 121, and from which I quote the following extracts:

To mix any material with distilled spirits, wine, or other liquor, which does not result in producing either a spurious imitation or compound liquor is not rectification.

To determine whether the mixing is rectification or not under this clause of the statute, you must, therefore, look to the result to see whether either of the three kinds of liquors named is manufactured by the mixing. A spurious liquor is an imitation of and held out to be genuine.

An imitation liquor is one that is an imitation of the genuine and held out as such imitation.

A compound liquor is any liquor composed of two or more kinds of spirits mixed with any material which changes the original character of either so as to produce a different kind as known by the trade.

It follows, therefore, that the mixing of liquors identical in kind, as known by the trade, does not constitute rectification.

For instance, a party may mix a material with spirits, wine, or other liquor, which will not produce either a spurious, imitation, or compound liquor, but such mixing is nevertheless rectification if it results in either purifying or refining the spirits, wine, or other articles thus mixed.

From the foregoing it is apparent that a compound liquor is neither a spurious nor an imitation liquor, and that rectified whisky is neither a spurious, an imitation, nor a compound liquor.

What is described as compound liquor is known in the trade as applied to whisky, as a blend, which usually includes the addition of harmless flavoring and coloring matter.

A mixed whisky is a mixture of two straight whiskies without the addition of anything else, and a rectified whisky is a whisky made by freeing the high wines from fusel oil and adding thereto coloring and flavoring.

GOVERNMENTAL INSPECTION OF RECTIFIERS AND BLENDERS.

There is as much governmental inspection and supervision, if not more, thrown around the business of the rectifier, blender, and wholesale liquor dealer as there is around the business of the distiller.

Section 3319, Revised Statutes of the United States, limits the persons from whom a rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer may purchase distilled spirits. Penalty, $1,000.

Section 3317a, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that when a rectifier expects to rectify or compound distilled spirits he shall, before emptying any package of distilled spirits for that purpose, give notice in duplicate to the collector and submit such package for the inspection of the United States gauger, who weighs, gauges, and makes return thereof to the collector.

Section 3320, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that when a package is filled on the premises of a rectifier, it shall first be inspected and gauged by a United States gauger, who shall affix a stamp thereto, etc.

Section 3318, Revised Statutes United States, as amended, provides that every rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer shall provide a book, to be kept in a form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and that he shall on the same day on which he receives any spirits, and before he touches them or alters them in any way, enter in such book the name of the persons or firm, from whom and where received, by whom distilled, rectified, or compounded, and when and by whom inspected; the number of wine and proof gallons, the kind of spirits and the number and kind of stamps thereon; and before he sends any spirits away from his premises he shall make similar entries, thus keeping a perfect account with the Government of everything which he receives in and everything which he sends out. He is furthermore required to keep this book open for inspection, and on or before the tenth day of each month he must send to the collector a transcript covering the preceding month. Any false entry or failure to keep the book is severely punished.

Section 3277, Revised Statutes United States, requires rectifiers to furnish facilities to internal-revenue officers to examine and gauge any vessel or utensil on the premises, and to supply all the necessary assistance for inspecting the premises, stocks, and apparatus applying to such persons, and for that purpose he must open all doors, boxes, packages, and casks for examination, under a heavy penalty.

Section 3456, Revised Statutes United States, provides that if any rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer fails to do any of the things required by law or does anything prohibited by law, and no specific punishment is mentioned by any other provision, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000 and forfeit all the liquors owned by him or in which he may have any interest.

There are about 1,000 real rectifying houses, and a Government guager is assigned to each, and in addition there is quite a large number of special agents and assistants who continually inspect these places.

From the foregoing, which, however, are not all the provisions of law relating to the inspection and supervision of the business of the rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer, it is apparent that it is not possible for him to do any of the disreputable things which have been charged to him. It is no more profitable for him to add anything deleterious or poisonous than it is for the distiller; and the worst thing which it is possible for him to add is the purest and most wholesome thing from the standpoint of the distiller.

Nothing which he could add could possibly be worse than the fusel oil, which may be in excessive quantities in immature straight distillates.

The Lord did not put fusel oil into straight whisky any more than he made a suit of clothes which you wear. Both are manufactured articles, and neither is a natural product. When fusel oil is in whisky in excessive quantities, it is there because of the carelessness or the cupidity of the distiller.

DECISION OF ENGLISH COURTS.

The British Parliamentary commission, after taking testimony for two years, decided in 1891 that what I have described as a blend was whisky; and the issue of the recent whisky trials in London was not, as has been stated, What was whisky? But the issue was whether a distillate made from corn was entitled to be called "Scotch" or "Irish" whisky, and it was very properly decided that it was not.

The old-fashioned name for the raw whisky as it comes from the receiving cistern at the distillery was "wines" or "high wines," in contradistinction from the first run, which was called "low wine." In the case of United States v. Eight Barrels of Whisky (25 Fed. Cases, 982), a United States court, in 1867, stated as follows:

Pouring the wines into the vat was the first act toward rectification, which was followed by the rectifying process, thereby changing the wines into whisky.

And it is pertinent to inquire that if that person produced whisky in 1867, and prior thereto, why does it not still produce whisky? At that time there was no bonded period, no bonded warehouses, no charred-barrel process of refination and purification, and no whisky of the bottled-in-bond variety; yet there was whisky.

A WORD ON THE PRODUCTION OF ALCOHOL.

Alcohol is produced by fermentation of a mash—something like a mush—and distillation only serves to separate the volatile from the nonvolatile matters in the mash.

This separation takes place by converting the volatile matters into steam and then condensing it. The result is termed "spirit of wines."

As the result of the first distillation, the product is about one-third alcohol and two-thirds water, and hence is called "low wines."

By the second distillation of these low wines there is produced what is called "high wines," which contain all the way from a little over half alcohol and less than half water to about two-thirds alcohol and one-third water.

If the product is to be put into a charred barrel, it is reduced to one-half water and one-half alcohol by the addition of more water.

The product is then approximately one-half water and one-half ethyl alcohol, with about 0.50 of 1 per cent of fusel oil.

If you should remove the fusel oil, there would remain just the water and the ethyl alcohol, about half and half, and this is called "neutral spirits" or "cologne spirits." If you should then take out all the water, there would then remain nothing but alcohol, or what is sometimes called "double-proof spirits."

Usquebaugh, from which the word "whisky" is derived, means "water of waters," which indicates that you can not have whisky unless you add water to alcohol.

When the word "whisky" was first used by the Irish and the Scotch, it referred exclusively to a compounded beverage, consisting of water and alcohol, to which coloring and flavoring were added; and that is true even to this day, for no matter by what process whisky is made, it contains coloring and flavoring which has been added in some way.

THE COLORING OF WHISKY.

The coloring of whisky, of the bottled-in-bond variety, is due to caramel and tannic acid which it extracts from the barrel which has been prepared to enable it to do so. The controlling flavor in such whisky is obtained from the same source, for if the same whisky should be put into a barrel made of some other kind of wood than northern white oak which has been charred, the flavor would be entirely different.

In this connection I submit a clipping from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of March 21, 1906:

WHISKY TO LOSE DARK-BROWN TASTE—WHITE OAK SCARCE, COOPERS MUST USE INFERIOR WOOD FOR BARRELS.

If the fears of the National Coopers' Association, now in session at the Southern Hotel, are realized, whisky drinkers must prepare themselves for a radical change in the color and taste of their favorite beverage.

The delegates say that the northern white oak, now regarded as the only timber suitable for making whisky barrels, is rapidly disappearing, and that soon some other material must be used. The barrel of white oak is charred inside, which causes the formation of a resinous gum between the clear and the solid wood. This gum, it is said, gives whisky much of its well-known color and long-remembered taste.

The association has appealed to the United States Government to preserve the white oak timber from destruction, and at the session Wednesday Dr. Herman Von Schrenk, in charge of the Government Bureau of Agriculture, located at Shaw's Garden, touched on this topic in a talk on forestry.

The officers of the association are: A. S. Ray, Chicago, president; James E. Tyler, Baltimore; J. R. Kelly, Kansas City, Kan., and W. J. Murray, St. Paul, vice-presidents, and Walker L. Wellford, secretary and treasurer. Sixty delegates are present.

All whisky equally pure, whether straight, blendid, rectified, or mixed, consists only of ethyl alcohol and water plus a flavor, and with the limitation that the things used to produce the flavor shall not be harmful or deleterious, the interest of the public is fully protected.

My purpose in this matter is that any law enacted shall be made to apply to all whiskies equally and to discriminate against none. This Congress should not take a stand for or against the distillers of whisky known as "straight whisky" or the rectifier of the blended or compounded article.

No provision is made to prevent the sale of new straight whisky, that is concededly unfit for consumption. Whisky of the bottled-in-bond variety can not be put up and placed on the market unless it is 4 years old, but straight whisky in barrels can be put on the market at the owner's discretion.

All of the articles made of silent spirits, water, and the so-called "aging oil," "beading oil," and the various essences, and put on the market as whisky are not the blended or rectified article and should not be confounded with it.

The paragraph in this bill in relation to whisky as reported to the House by the committee is, I believe, the best solution of the question.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, in order that another phase of the question may be discussed, I yield the balance of my time to my colleague from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I venture somewhat reluctantly and quite unexpectedly to obtrude myself in this debate, owing to the direction which it has taken. I shall address myself particularly to this side of the House in an endeavor to point out the reason why I do not believe the Constitution should be invoked, especially by Democrats, against such a measure as this.

I am one of the firmest believers in State rights upon this floor. I believe that our Constitution is the most perfect product of human capacity. But why? Because its operation has resulted in the most perfect scheme of government ever established on this earth. Now, what is a perfect government? A perfect government manifestly is one which affords complete—absolutely complete—protection to the life, the health, the liberty, and the property of every person subject to its jurisdiction. To the extent that it fails in furnishing this complete protection it falls short of excellence. Wherever through any complexity in its structure a wrong is shielded or a rogue sheltered from punishment, then an injury to justice is perpetrated by the very agency established to protect justice, and that government stands discredited. When gentlemen, without the slightest attempt to meet or explain these evidences of crime and fraud placed upon that table by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], yet declare that this measure, by which it is proposed to deal with those abuses effectively, is unconstitutional, and that the police power of the State, which has not been able to prevent these wrongs, is the only power to which we can appeal, they write down a condemnation of our whole constitutional system graver than any I have ever heard leveled against it.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that our Constitution was intended by the framers to furnish an effective shield for wrong or a refuge for criminals, and yet for the last twenty years (I think since the Supreme Court acted upon the reconstruction laws) I do not remember having heard the Constitution invoked upon this floor except to obstruct some measure of redress against a wrong that all conceded to exist and which no one could venture openly to defend.

The late Speaker Reed, who had an epigrammatic way of stating philosophic truths, used to say when any person declared a measure was unconstitutional, that meant he did not like it; when there was no reason that one could afford to avow for opposing a bill, it was always safe to try and block its progress by declaring that it violated the Constitution. And recent experiences all prove the truth of that statement. Every rogue at the head of a railroad system who gave rebates, and shared them, always insisted that he railway rate bill was unconstitutional. Not one of them would venture to defend the villainies which perverted the naturally beneficent operations of commerce into schemes by which some men plundered all their fellows, but every one begged you to consider the Constitution. When pursued in the State courts they profess the most tender concern for the integrity of the Union, begging us to guard jealously the authority of this Federal Government, whose existence had been maintained in blood and carnage on every battlefield from Bull Run to Appomattox. When the Federal Government pursues them then they profess deep, tearful, and vociferous concern about State rights, declaring that for themselves they care nothing—their rogueries are, of course, not to be excused—but what is the roguery of one rascal, however depraved, when weighed in the balance against the reserved powers of the States which would be invaded and imperiled if these infamies were checked and their perpetrators punished. No one on this floor denies that these outrages on health and these wrongs on common honesty described by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] have been perpetrated, but several gentlemen declare that the States alone have the power to deal with them, and all this in the face of these impressive and numerous evidences that the States have actually failed to prevent them piled up before our eyes on yonder table.

Mr. Chairman, if the arguments in opposition to this measure be well founded, if the Constitution is indeed a bar to the redress of these grievances and the prevention of these crimes, then the Constitution itself stands discredited. If every contention of the gentleman from Texas were sustained by the decisions of the Supreme Court, the result would be conclusive proof that a change or amendment of the Constitution was absolutely necessary to the safety of the citizen. I don't believe any change is necessary, advisable, or permissible. I believe the Constitution as it stands approaches perfection already, because I believe its distribution of powers, instead of being pitfalls for justice and sanctuaries for criminals, is the most effective scheme ever devised for preventing wrong by assigning to each Department the jurisdiction which it can exercise most effectively, and placing in the arsenal of each the weapon it can wield with greatest effect for the protection of the citizen in all his rights of life, health, and liberty. For that reason, sir, I believe the Federal Government has ample authority to deal with everything by which citizens of one State can affect the well-being of citizens in another through the operation of commerce. And there is not a decision of the Supreme Court in conflict with that position. That feature of the Constitution constitutes its chief title to excellence. When you deny it you impeach the Constitution, and declare it to be not an agency of civilization, but a barrier to progress, not a protection to life, a shield to health, and a rampart to property, but a disturbance to order and a menace to morals.

Mr. Chairman, let us examine closely the contention of opponents to the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], in voicing the opposition, has quoted certain decisions of the Supreme Court which have established beyond all question the power of a State to take any measures inside its own borders that it may deem essential to the safety and welfare of its own people. That is what is known as the police power of a State. But while the State is absolutely free to deal with its own internal concerns as it pleases, it is an essential feature of our system that no State can by law or otherwise interfere with commerce or restrict communication between its citizens and those of all other States. The citizen of each State and the products of his industry can circulate in every other State on exactly the same terms as its own citizens and their property. No discrimination can be made, either in the laws or the enforcement of laws by any State between its own citizens and those of other States or their wares. The gentleman has quoted a case where a certain quantity of coffee which had been brought into a State and found to be discolored was condemned by a State official under authority of a State law and destroyed with the sanction of the United States Supreme Court. Why, of course, any article found inside a State is subject to its laws no matter from whence it may have come. The source of its origin does not give it any right to exceptional treatment. But it must be treated exactly the same as any other coffee or meat within the borders of the same State. But, suppose the State of Texas or the State of New York to-day, finding that the inspection of meat products established by the State of Illinois was inadequate, or finding that although the provisions of law in Illinois were adequate yet, nevertheless, corruption on the part of the local official nullified the restraining statute and permitted goods that were poisonous to be sent from Chicago into either State, neither State could exclude from its territory canned goods prepared in Illinois.

Now, my friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] will say, "Why can not the State of New York examine these products when they come into its borders?" I answer because effective examination at that stage is wholly impracticable. There is only one place where inspection can be made effective, and that is at the source of the danger. Canned goods when opened are destroyed. There is no way by which you can examine the contents without opening the cans, and therefore you can not inspect them except by destroying them. Suppose now—and I put it to my friend from Texas, who is so good a lawyer that even his ardor in controversy could not betray him into the assertion of an unsound legal principle—suppose that the State of New York, in view of recent exposures in Chicago, should pass a law—he has admitted that no State could pass a law excluding goods coming from another State merely because the system of inspection in that other State was considered imperfect, but the State could investigate, he says, each separate package—suppose New York State should pass a law based on that theory, providing that every kind of meat entering its limits—not necessarily from Chicago, but from any foreign city—should be opened and examined, while meat prepared in its own canning factories, under an inspection at the time and place of preparation by its own officers, should be exempt from any further examination, does anybody believe the Supreme Court of the United States would tolerate such a law? Would it not be held upon this mere statement of its character a restraint, a prohibition of this branch of commerce between New York and Illinois, and under the doctrine laid down by Marshall, which has been the strongest force in maintaining peace between the States——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCKRAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Does the gentleman contend that the State of New York would not have the authority to provide for the punishment of any individual in New York who should import or sell an article of impure food or poisonous matter?

Mr. COCKRAN. But, Mr. Chairman, we are not speaking here of punishment, but prevention.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is prevention.

Mr. COCKRAN. Now, the gentleman must excuse me——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. That is the identical question you asked me. And if you will yield to me one moment I will give you an instance.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not want a colloquy with the gentleman; I can not allow an extraneous discussion between him and me to be interposed in an argument which I am addressing to the committee. The gentleman has made a splendid argument, and I am trying in less time and with much less ability to make an imperfect one. When the gentleman realizes how I am handicapped in time and qualification——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will not interrupt the gentleman, because he evidently does not wish to answer.

Mr. COCKRAN. You have asked me a question, and I have answered. The gentleman evidently regards prevention and punishment as synonymous. I hold them to be radically different, absolutely incompatible and inconsistent with each other. Prevention obviates any necessity or reason for punishment. Punishment is inflicted only where prevention has failed. I will ask you this question now, and you can answer it, yes or no.

Suppose canned meats were prepared in New York City; could the State of New York, having established a system of inspection at the time and place of preparation which it believed entirely sufficient for the safety of its own citizens, pass a law declaring that every package of canned meat coming into that State from any other State should be opened and inspected in order to make sure that it conformed to the standard established for similar products in its own jurisdiction?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will answer that question this way—by saying that the State of Massachusetts passed a law prohibiting the importation or sale of oleomargarine in Massachusetts, and the Supreme Court sustained that law of Massachusetts; which answers your question.

Mr. COCKRAN. Well, if the gentleman please, he does not answer my question. The case which he quotes has no relevancy whatever to the situation, I am assuming. If the State of Massachusetts had permitted the manufacture of oleomargarine inside its own limits, and then had undertaken to prohibit such merchandise coming in from another State, that would be unconstitutional, and the gentleman knows it. Where a State prohibits the manufacture of goods, it can of course prohibit importation of the same goods. Whatever system a State establishes for its own products it can apply to the products of other States within its own borders. The commodity it will not allow to be produced within its own borders it can prevent being brought into its limits from without its borders. Canned meats prepared in its own territory it can inspect at the time of preparation. Canned goods brought from other States it can inspect only by opening each can, and such inspection is destruction, as the gentleman knows. The brilliant rhetoric of the gentleman from Texas invites us to vindicate the Constitution by destroying the commerce which the Constitution is established to protect. Canned meats have become an important feature of food supply in every State of the Union. The development of that industry has cheapened the cost of living and largely improved its condition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I yield the gentleman the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for seventeen minutes more.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not know that I will need that much time. But I would like to say to the gentleman from Texas and to other gentlemen who have taken a similar position that as no effective precaution can be taken by one State against poisonous or dangerous canned meats coming from other States—except an inspection of each package, which would involve destruction of the commodities against which the precaution is taken—that fact alone justifies this measure. Nay, more, it makes the passage of this bill an imperative necessity of our national well-being. The gentleman knows that if the State of New York had a law permitting meats to be canned under conditions of inspection considered adequate to protect the health of the State and its people, it could not constitutionally provide that similar goods coming in from outside should be opened for inspection when the opening would destroy their value, for that would be a discrimination against foreign commerce. Yet, that is the only method of inspection that could be effective, for clearly one State can not enter another for the purpose of inspecting the manner in which food products are prepared by its citizens even when they are intended for interstate commerce. I ask again, Is there any other way by which we in New York can protect ourselves? There is but one, and that is for the Federal Government itself to undertake inspection at the time and place of preparation of all canned meats or inclosed packages of food intended for commerce between the States. Yet this system the opponents of the measure insist is in violation of the Constitution. Are we to be told that one city, through the avarice of its government, or the corruption of its officials, can imperil the health of every other community because the Constitution of the United States limits the power of any State to impose restrictions on commerce with another State? That salutary restraint made effective on each State by the decision of John Marshall was one of the most valuable among the four leading principles established by him, which furnish foundations for the four constitutional pillars that sustain this noble governmental structure under which we live.

Mr. HENRY of Texas rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COCKRAN. I yield to a question, if the gentleman will put it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I hold, briefly, that the inspection laws do not come from the commerce clause of the Constitution——

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not yield to the gentleman to answer a question and ask it afterwards.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If you are unwilling for me to ask it in my own way, I will adjust myself to that.

Mr. COCKRAN. If you wish to ask a question, put it; but I beg that you will not answer it first and ask it afterwards.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I yielded to you.

Mr. COCKRAN. I yield if you are ready to put the question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, the inspection laws do not come from the Constitution, but they were reserved to the State. My contention is that in the inspection the State has the right to provide for the inspection of any article that is deleterious to the health of the people that come into that State, and by absolutely destroying that article if necessary; but they have no power to put unreasonable impediments on the commerce coming from another State. That fairly states my position.

Mr. COCKRAN. I am delighted to hear this account of the gentleman's position. His statement has probably shed some light upon his own mind, but I do not know that it has helped make clear my pathway.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have been endeavoring to state my position for the benefit of the committee, not exclusively for the benefit of the gentleman.

Mr. COCKRAN. I have no doubt at all that it will edify the committee to understand the gentleman's position. I resume now the effort to state mine. The gentleman insists the State should exercise the power of inspection and the only mode of effective inspection open to it is one that involves destruction of the commodity inspected. If such a method of inspection would not be an unreasonable impediment on commerce I am a poor judge of impediments. If this view of the gentleman from Texas be sound, our Government in its distribution of power, instead of being the most efficient plan ever devised for the suppression of wrong and the vindication of justice, is a complex, puzzling, incomprehensible series of labyrinths where the footsteps of justice when pursuing crime go astray, and where the wrongdoer finds an asylum where he can plan in security the perpetration of fresh enormities. [Applause.] That is not my conception of the Constitution under which I live, and which I love. We all believe that the State can do what it pleases inside its limits on all matters affecting its own citizens. But when by the corruption of its officers or the laxity of its laws any State through its commerce endangers you in Texas or me in New York, if we admit there is no power anywhere adequate to our full protection, then we write down the condemnation of our whole system.

But, sir, I believe that the power exists and that it is ample. I believe it is at our hands here in this body and in the Senate. Wherever the Constitution denies a State the right to exercise any power for its own protection it is always because the protection can be secured more completely by the Federal Government. If my State has not itself power to take effective precaution against the rottenness of Packingtown, it is because the Federal Government steps in with its own legislation for my protection, and when it throws the shield of its protection around me I feel vastly more secure than if New York were exhausting all its power in my behalf. For the sword wielded by the United States is long enough to reach from the banks of the Hudson or of the Rio Grande to Chicago, or anywhere else within the country, and is strong enough to thwart, defeat, strike down any nefarious enterprise conceived in cupidity, maintained in corruption, and menacing your safety or mine. [Applause.] Mr. Chairman, I protest against any narrow, short-sighted conception of our Constitution which, while professing reverence for its words, thwarts its purpose and by making it a barrier and an obstacle rather than an effective aid to justice, perverts its spirit and discredits its character. If the Federal Government should undertake to interfere with the personal conduct of the citizen, to declare what I may eat or do personally in my own city of New York, it would be an invader and an intruder in the lawful domain of the State, and that stretch of its power would destroy or at least impair its value. But while it stands at the frontier of every State leaving it absolutely free to regulate all its internal affairs, but preventing it from impairing by the operations of commerce the security of health or property in any other State—while it occupies that attitude, I admire its perfection as much as I appreciate its protection.

The legislation proceeds exactly upon these lines. I am sure every Democrat believing in States rights should be the first to sustain and assert every lawful power of the Federal Government, as he should be the last to sanction any stretch of its authority beyond those bounds fixed by the Constitution to maintain State and nation as agencies of the highest efficiency for the protection of every citizen in the safety of his life, health, liberty, and property. And the limits of each are not difficult to ascertain or define. As I said in the course of a colloquy here this morning, wherever a condition affects the people of a State, the government of that State must deal with it. Wherever, by the disposal of its products through trade, it affects directly the conditions of people in other States, it touches that commerce between States which the Constitution empowers the Federal Government to regulate, and which it must have full power to regulate, or else its authority is a sham and a snare. The gentleman admits the Federal Government can regulate interstate commerce. Surely he will not pretend that it can regulate commerce between the States so as to require railways to put brakes on certain trains and to fix rates for the transportation of goods for the promotion of my convenience and yet be without power to regulate it for the protection of my existence. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this statement of the proposition renders further argument in its favor entirely superfluous.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRAN. With pleasure. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then you say that Congress has the power to regulate interstate commerce. If it has (and I admit that it has to regulate interstate commerce), has it the power to send into another State an article admitted to be poisonous and injurious?

Mr. COCKRAN. Has Congress the power to do it?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not think Congress has any such thing as a poisonous article of food within its possessions.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Under the power to regulate, I contend——

Mr. COCKRAN. Why, certainly it has. You can not give power to anybody, that it may not be possible——

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I thought a moment ago you argued that it had not the power to poison the people, and yet you admit it has the power to send in a poisonous article under its power to regulate.

Mr. COCKRAN. I do not know how anyone can draw such an inference from anything that I said; but much that has occurred in the course of the day has given me a high opinion of the luxuriance of the gentleman's imagination. [Laughter.] I do not say this in disparagement or criticism. The orator must be luxuriant in imagination or he could not be so fervid in speech. I do not think anything that I said justifies his statement. But misapprehension of my words has been so persistent I will repeat the proposition I have been trying to establish. The State being without power to interfere with interstate commerce, and being also without power to protect its citizens against the invasion of poisionous goods by inspection at the place where they are canned, which is the only protection that would be effective, the power to protect it must be in Congress, or else the whole constitutional system is radically and fatally defective. You and I believe that perfection in any constitutional system must consist in its adequacy to protect every essential right of the citizen. The gentleman asks if Congress itself could permit poisonous articles to be sent through the channels of commerce. Since Congress has the power to protect, of course it can abuse this power. All power may be abused. The possibility of abuse is an essential and available incident of government. You can not place a gentleman in the chair of this House to enforce order but that he himself may become an agent of disorder. You can not establish a court to administer justice between parties but that it may become corrupt and make itself an engine to perpetrate the grossest injustice. This power of Congress to regulate commerce between States so that it may not be perverted from a beneficent system of mutual cooperation and improvement into a scheme of mutual injury and wrong may be abused. To say that is simply to say that our Government is the product of imperfect human nature and necessarily shares the limitations of its source. But it is the best system ever yet established by the ingenuity of man. It never yet has sent a poisoned article into any State, as the gentleman seems to apprehend it may. It sees poisoned articles now on their way into all the States from many different sources of fraud, injury, and poison flourishing in several States either by toleration of the State governments or by laxity in the enforcement of their laws. By this bill the Federal Government standing at the frontier of each State will say to the sender of goods from other States: "Hereafter when you undertake to enter these markets with a package about the contents of which there is any mystery you must do so with its character written plainly over its surface." [Applause.] That is the sum total of this legislation, and we who support it are the true upholders of State and National rights, for by asserting each to the widest limit we uphold the power and maintain the complete security of both. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, no man can attempt to discuss the Constitution in two or three minutes, but I think I shall be successful in that brief space of time in disposing of at least one of the arguments of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. I have heard only two reasons advanced for this bill. One is the convenience of manufacturers who, by reason of conflicting State laws, would be obliged to put up goods in different ways in order to meet the requirements of these States. That is an argument of convenience only. The other argument has been made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], and it is this, that with respect to one class of goods, namely, canned goods, the States have no power to protect themselves against the impositions of canners in other States, because he asserts that if such canned goods are opened for inspection they will be destroyed. He asserts that as a consequence that would be regarded as a discrimination by the law of one State against the citizens of another which would not stand the test of the Constitution.

Mr. COCKRAN. Provided——

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I must decline to yield, as I have only three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Now, then, let us analyze the argument of the gentleman from New York. He must concede that the canner in the State of New York selling his goods to the inhabitants of New York can lawfully be subjected to an inspection of such goods. The State of New York may place its inspectors in his factory, thus compelling him to put up and sell pure goods to the people of New York.

The argument of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] therefore amounts to this, that although the citizen of New York engaged in the packing or canning business must submit to inspection, his competitor in the State of New Jersey need not, forsooth, because to inspect his canned goods is to destroy them and therefore to discriminate unlawfully against him! By what logic can it be maintained that a State may discriminate against its own citizens in that manner? If you concede the argument of the gentleman from New York you must admit that any goods coming from one State into a second State in a can, in a bottle, in any package of that kind, can not be inspected, and therefore that the State is powerless to resist the frauds of canners, packers, and shippers in other States. To state the proposition is to answer it. It is simply monstrous. I do not believe that the Supreme Court would hesitate for a single moment to uphold a law of the State of New York which submitted canned goods from other States to inspection by the officers of the State of New York at some point of time in order to protect the health of the inhabitants of the State of New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman the balance of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SULLIVAN] has made a most admirable argument against a thing I did not say. It is the easiest thing in the world to establish a man of straw and then, without serious damage to your shoe leather, kick him into the gutter. I did say this, and the gentleman, by his evasion of the question, confesses the strength of the position. I said that if the State of New York established a system of inspection for canned goods—for goods canned inside its own limits—at the time and place of preparation, and then provided that every article of canned goods entering its borders should be opened for inspection, that in effect would be ordering them destroyed, and the Supreme Court would hold such a provision to be a restriction upon commerce with another State, and therefore unconstitutional. If the gentleman, weighty though his authority may be, should dissent from this view, I must still hold to the same opinion, and I do not believe any lawyer beside himself would differ from me.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if I have any further time I shall be very glad to add to the gayety of nations by yielding it to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed by the rule adopted by the House for general debate in the committee has expired, and under the rule the bill will be read through as a single paragraph. At the conclusion of the reading amendments will be in order to any part of the bill. The Chair desires to state that if gentlemen desire to make points of order against any part of the substitute they should do so immediately upon the conclusion of the reading and before amendments are acted upon, since after an amendment has been offered and acted upon it will be too late to make a point of order. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule adopted, is it necessary to read the bill, or only the committee amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the rule provides that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute shall be read. Without objection, it will be read.

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the proposition, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. That the substitute be read in lieu of reading the Senate bill, and the Chair is of the opinion that the rule so provides.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understood the Chair to say that this whole amendment would be read as one section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated, and the Chair understands that it is required by the rule.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will it be read as one paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; as one paragraph.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman may proceed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that there are two prints of the proposed committee amendment—one begins on page 18, lines 8 and 9, and the other begins on page 19, line 3. Which of these is the correct print?

Mr. MANN. The one that begins on page 19, line 3.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. At what time will points of order to amendments be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. When the amendments are offered.

Mr. SHERLEY. Are they to be offered at any time after the reading?

The CHAIRMAN. Only one amendment is to be pending at a time.

Mr. TALBOTT. Are they to be offered as the paragraphs are read?

The CHAIRMAN. No; not until the reading of the substitute is concluded. Then gentlemen will be recognized to offer amendments to any part of the substitute.

Mr. TALBOTT. I understood the Chair to say that the bill would be read through as one paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so stated.

Mr. TALBOTT. When will points of order to the sections be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Points of order should be made immediately upon the conclusion of the reading of the whole bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, is the substitute going to be read clear through and then be read again by sections for amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the amendments will then be in order to any part of the bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I suppose that following the usual custom, these amendments that are proposed by the committee will be first in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The members of the committee will be first recognized, as usual. The Clerk will read the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the introduction into any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or from any foreign country, or shipment to any foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, within the meaning of this act, is hereby prohibited; and any person who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State or Territory or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or who shall receive in any State or Territory or the District of Columbia from any other State or Territory or the District of Columbia, or foreign country, or who, having received, shall deliver, in original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, or offer to deliver to any other person, any such article so adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or any person who shall sell or offer for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States any such adulterated or misbranded foods or drugs, or export or offer to export the same to any foreign country, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for such offense be fined not exceeding $200 for the first offense, and upon conviction for each subsequent offense not exceeding $300 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, however, That no person shall be liable to the penalty of imprisonment as provided herein unless he knowingly committed the offense charged: Provided further, That no article shall be deemed misbranded or adulterated within the provisions of this act when intended for export to any foreign country and prepared or packed according to the specifications or directions of the foreign purchaser when no substance is used in the preparation or packing thereof in conflict with the laws of the foreign country to which said article is intended to be shipped; but if said article shall be in fact sold or offered for sale for domestic use or consumption, then this proviso shall not exempt said article from the operation of all the other provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall make uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act, including the collection and examination of specimens of foods and drugs manufactured or offered for sale in the District of Columbia, or in any Territory of the United States, or which shall be offered for sale in unbroken packages in any State other than that in which they shall have been respectively manufactured or produced, or which shall be received from any foreign country, or intended for shipment to any foreign country, or which may be submitted for examination by the chief health, food, or drug officer of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or at any domestic or foreign port through which such product is offered for interstate commerce, or for export or import between the United States and any foreign port or country.

SEC. 3. That the examinations of specimens of foods and drugs shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such articles are adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and if it shall appear from any such examination that any of such specimens is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the party from whom such sample was obtained. Any party so notified shall be given an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if it appears that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such party, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article, duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer. After judgment of the court notice shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Agriculture shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any health or food or drug officer or agent of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation, to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States, without delay, for the enforcement of the penalties as in such case herein provided.

SEC. 5. That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary for internal or external use, and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease of either man or other animals. The term "food," as used herein, shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:

In case of drugs:

First. If, when a drug is sold under the standard recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of the investigation.

Second. If its strength or purity differ from any other professed standard or quality under which it is sold.

In the case of confectionery:

If it contain terra alba, barytes, talc, chrome yellow, or other mineral substance or poisonous color or flavor, or other ingredient deleterious or detrimental to health.

In the case of food:

First. If any substance has been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

Second. If any substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted.

Fourth. If it be mixed, colored, powdered, coated, or stained in a manner whereby damage or inferiority is concealed.

Fifth. If it contain any added poisonous or other added deleterious ingredient which may render such article injurious to health: Provided, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically, or by maceration in water, or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

Sixth. If it consists in whole or in part of a filthy, decomposed, or putrid animal or vegetable substance, or any portion of an animal unit for food, whether manufactured or not, or if it is the product of a diseased animal, or one that has died otherwise than by slaughter.

SEC. 7. That the term "misbranded," as used herein, shall apply to all drugs, or articles of food, or articles which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or substances contained in such article, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, and to any food or drug product which is falsely branded as to the State, Territory, or country in which it is manufactured or produced.

That for the purposes of this act an article shall also be deemed to be misbranded:

In case of drugs:

First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the name of another article.

Second. If the contents of the original package shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol therein, or of any opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance which may be contained therein.

In the case of food:

First. If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article.

Second. If it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, or purport to be a foreign product when not so.

Third. If in package form, the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure, on the outside of the package.

Fourth. If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular: Provided, That an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded in the following cases:

First. In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food, under their own distinctive names, and not an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, if the name be accompanied on the same label or brand with a statement of the place where said article has been manufactured or produced.

Second. In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are compounds, imitations, or blends: Provided, That the term "blend" as used herein shall be construed to mean a mixture of like substances, not excluding harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredient to disclose their trade formulas, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or misbranding.

SEC. 8. That no dealer shall be convicted under the provisions of this act when he is able to prove a guaranty of conformity with the provisions of this act in form approved by the rules and regulations herein provided for, signed by the manufacturer or the party or parties from whom he purchased said articles: Provided, That said guarantor resides within the United States. Said guaranty shall contain the full name and address of the guarantor making the sale to the dealer, and said guarantor shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would otherwise attach in due course to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable for the guidance of the officials charged with the administration of food laws and for the information of the courts, and to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to foods; and to aid him in reaching just decisions in such matters he is authorized to call upon the committee on food standards of the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists and the committee of standards of the Association of State Dairy and Food Departments, and such other exports as he may deem necessary. And upon request made to the Secretary of Agriculture prior to reaching any decision as provided for in this section, by any manufacturer or other person interested, asking for the appointment of a board to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of any preservative or other substance which is or may be added to foods, and concerning the use of which the person making the request has an interest, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint a board of disinterested experts, which board shall consist of five members, one of whom shall be an expert toxicologist, one an expert physiological chemist, one an expert bacteriologist, one an expert pathologist, and one an expert pharmacologist, which board shall meet at the city of Washington, D. C., or elsewhere, at the call of the Secretary of Agriculture, and pass upon such questions after proper notice and hearing granted to the person making such request. The compensation of the members of such board shall be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 10. That every person who manufactures or produces for shipment and delivers for transportation within the District of Columbia or any Territory, or who manufactures or produces for shipment or delivers for transportation from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country, any drug or article of food, and every person who exposes for sale or delivers to a purchaser in the District of Columbia or any Territory any drug or article of food manufactured or produced within said District of Columbia or any Territory, or who exposes for sale or delivers for shipment any drug or article of food received from a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia other than the State, Territory, or the District of Columbia in which he exposes for sale or delivers such drug or article of food, or from any foreign country, shall furnish within business hours and upon tender and full payment of the selling price a sample of such drug or article of food to any person duly authorized by the rules and regulations herein provided for to receive the same, and who shall apply to such manufacturer, producer, or vendor, or person delivering to a purchaser, such drug or article of food, for such sample for such use, in sufficient quantity for the analysis of any such drug or article of food in his possession.

SEC. 11. That any manufacturer, producer, or dealer who refuses to comply, upon demand, with the requirements of section 10 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not exceeding $100, or imprisoned not exceeding one hundred days, or both. And any person found guilty of manufacturing or offering for sale, or selling, an adulterated or misbranded article of food or drug in violation of the provisions of this act may, in the discretion of the court, be adjudged to pay, in addition to the penalties hereinbefore provided for, all the necessary costs and expenses incurred in inspecting and analyzing such adulterated articles which said person may have been found guilty of manufacturing, selling, or offering for sale.

SEC. 12. That this act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State, nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States; but foods and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another so long as they remain in original unbroken packages, except as may be otherwise defined by law or provided by statutes of the United States.

SEC. 13. That any article of food or drug that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is transported or being transported from one State to another for sale, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or any Territory of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found and seized by a process of libel for condemnation. And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of as the said court may direct and the proceeds thereof, if sold, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, but such goods shall not be sold in any State contrary to the laws of that State. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform as near as may be to proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in such case; and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States.

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the character and extent of the adulteration of foods and drugs, and whenever he has reason to believe that articles are being imported from foreign countries which by reason of such adulteration are dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or are of kinds which are forbidden entry into or forbidden to be sold or restricted in sale in the countries in which they are made or from which they are exported, or which shall be falsely labeled in any respect, either by the omission of the name of any added ingredient or otherwise, or in regard to the place of manufacture, or the contents of the package, shall make a request upon the Secretary of the Treasury for samples from original packages of such articles for inspection and analysis; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to open such original packages and deliver specimens to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose mentioned, giving due notice to the owner or consignee of such articles, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture and have the right to introduce testimony; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee of any of such goods which the Secretary of Agriculture reports to him have been inspected and analyzed and found to be any of the kinds mentioned in this section: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee such goods, pending examination and decision in the matter, on execution of a penal bond of the full invoice value of such goods, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such goods for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, when demanded, for the purpose of excluding them from the country, or for other purposes, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount covered by the bond.

SEC. 15. That the term "territory" as used in this act shall include the insular possessions of the United States.

SEC. 16. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage: Provided, however, That no penalites herein named shall be imposed until after the expiration of one year from the passage of the act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize gentlemen who desire to make points of order.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I intended to make a point of order against the paragraph, or section 7, but I shall not do so now. I desire to state, however, that at the proper time I will move to amend by striking out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I understand that all points of order were reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. No points of order are reserved at all. Unless points of order are made before the first amendment is acted upon, the points of order will not be considered.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, if it is necessary, I desire to reserve all points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think that that can be done, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no points of order myself; I only desire to hold it open for my colleague.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, by direction of the committee, I offer the following amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 19, line 3, after the word "health," insert "or any vinous, malt, or spiritous liquor or compound or narcotic drug.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to find out what it is.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I can explain the amendment in a word. This is the provision of the bill that relates to confectionery, and the amendment which I offered, by direction of the committee, will forbid putting into confectionery or candy vinous or spirituous liquors or narcotics.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is it for the purpose of doing away with the so-called "rock-and-rye drops?"

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether they are "rock-and-rye drops," but I have here a collection, which I will be glad to let the gentlemen of the House sample, where intoxicants are sold to children in the form of candy, which ought not to be tolerated. This amendment is also offered at the request of the Treasury Department, which has called attention to the considerable importation of candies recently filled with alcoholic spirits in bonbons and chocolate candies, and the committee thought it was desirable not to permit the children to eat candy containing narcotic drugs, cocaine, opium, or alcohol in any form.

Mr. GROSVENOR and Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Ohio wish to ask a question or to take the floor?

Mr. GROSVENOR. To take the floor.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One moment, then. Does this bill prohibit the making of candy, say, in the city of Nashville, containing these ingredients, or does it prohibit such candy from being sent from one State to another?

Mr. MANN. It simply forbids sending it from one State to another.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, the very interesting debate which has progressed in this House for six hours has developed some singular and phenomenal ideas in regard to the operation of the Constitution of the United States and its effect upon interstate commerce and is effect upon intrastate commerce. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], who is always eloquent and sometimes logical [laughter], has planted himself upon a proposition that is far-reaching and in the highest degree important if true. The proposition is that if there is carried on in one State of the Union a business in the form of manufacturing or any other business that in its consequences is likely to be deleterious and injurious to the common weal of the country in the matter of health or peace or any of the interests of citizenship, and the legislature of that State fails to suppress the evil and fails to prevent the spread of that evil to other States, then it is the duty of Congress to legislate for the destruction of the evil and to invade by law the State which is delinquent and put an end by legislation to the wrong being done. If that be so, Mr. Chairman, then we are truly at the end of even the police power by the State being exclusive. It has occurred to me to give an illustration of where the gentleman has landed in the pursuit of this eloquent chimerical proposition of his. There is carried on in the city of New York a business that is recognized by civilization as an evil and vice that permeates its victims and carries evil and contamination in its wake wherever it goes.

These houses in New York are contiguous to the States of Connecticut and New Jersey. The State of New York fails in its duty to suppress those houses, and that business is spreading disease into the States of New Jersey and Connecticut that are entitled to be protected by the General Government under the proposition of the gentleman from New York, but the State of New York is delinquent. It does not suppress the wrong or does not shut up those houses. It does not prevent the spread of that contamination of morals and health, and therefore, said the gentleman from New York logically, because that is the inevitable logic to which he is driven, it is the duty of the Congress of the United States to at once proceed to regulate that business in the city of New York and to suppress the places and destroy the evil.

Now, there is the whole of it and that is where we are inevitably driven to by such logic as the gentleman has used.

Mr. COCKRAN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has expired.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, can I move to strike out the last word?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not. The substitute we are considering is an amendment in the first degree; the amendment proposed by the committee is an amendment in the second degree, and a motion to strike out the last word would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time may be extended for two minutes so that I can answer that question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] asks that his time may be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCKRAN. I did not hear the beginning of the gentleman's remarks, but as to the portion I did hear, I desire to ask him if he does not make a distinction between the personal conduct of individuals and the commerce between States as affecting the jurisdiction of the Federal Government?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I do not when it comes to applying it to the logic of the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. I do not believe any of it, not only of the gentleman's argument, but what I argued myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20 strike out lines 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, and 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Second. If the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if, when the article contained be not described in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, and be not the prescription of a regular licensed physician, the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any of such substances contained therein: Provided, however, That it may be proven as a complete defense to any accusation or prosecution for failure to state the quantity or proportion of alcohol as above required that the quantity or proportion of alcohol contained in any package does not exceed the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active necessary constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment proposed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRICK] is not in order. The gentleman's amendment would be an amendment in the third degree. He can be recognized later on to offer his amendment.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose this amendment is debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order to make an amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. I asked if the amendment was debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. PAYNE. The Chair was about to put the question, and that was the reason I took the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Nobody had risen when the Chair put the question.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that in all medicines not included in the Pharmacopœia or National Formulary there shall be on the package or label the quantity or proportion of the narcotic or habit-forming drug. The National Formulary is made up each year by committees of the various medical and pharmaceutical societies of the United States and is a recognized standard, recognized by statute in almost if not every State of the Union. The Pharmacopœia is the decennial report covering the same substance, and in the Pharmacopœia and the National Formulary appear the records of these distinguished gentlemen constituting this commission or board making up the Formulary as to the value of these different medical properties for different things, and among other things the necessary amount of alcohol as a solvent or preservative.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who appoints them?

Mr. MANN. They are appointed by the medical societies and the pharmaceutical board, not Government appointees in any sense whatever, although some of the Government officials are on the board. But all of the State statutes recognize the Pharmacopœia, and we thought it was proper that Congress should follow the same line and also recognize it. The vital feature of the proposition is that morphine, opium, cocaine, choloroform, cannabis indica or hasheesh, choloral hydrate, and other remedies named therein shall be made known if included in the article.

I inserted in the RECORD of yesterday a large number of cases, partly of deaths caused by opium in medicine and partly of habit formed by the use of medicine where the person had no knowledge that opium, morphine, or cocaine was included in the medicine. I think it is only fair to the public that all of these substances shall be made known in these remedies We do not provide that they shall be made known in the pharmacopœial remedies, because they are all published and fully known to the trade, and it is only the trade which makes use of these pharmacopœial remedies.

Mr. BRICK. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. MANN. I yield to a question.

Mr. BRICK. As I understand the gentleman from Illinois, this amendment would allow a proprietary medicine to be made from the Pharmacopœia and from the National Formulary, and that when they are so made they need not be published on the label, even though they contain opium or anything else of the character mentioned in this amendment. Is that true?

Mr. MANN. That is true, Mr. Chairman, and it is also true that it can only be sold under the name in which it appears in the Pharmacopœia, and can not be sold as patent medicines are often now sold, under high-sounding names, tending to make the people believe that there are substances in them which will cure the disease, when it is pure fancy. We do not want to interfere with the sale of proprietary pharmacopœial remedies under their own proper names. That is all.

Mr. BRICK. But a person might have taken opium and cocaine or any of these deleterious drugs and not know it if the patent medicine used was constructed out of the Pharmacopœia. Is that true?

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman——

Mr. BRICK. Is not that the fact?

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt that people can buy cocaine and buy opium in pharmacopœial remedies; but it is practically impossible for them to use pharmacopœial remedies as proprietary. Nobody, in the first place, will pay four prices for a pharmacopœial remedy because it happens to be sold as a patent medicine, when at the first drug store they meet they can find identically the same thing under the same name at 25 per cent of the cost of the proprietary article. Now, the gentleman comes in here, not himself, but his proposition, from the people engaged in the proprietary-medicine business, wishing to prevent what they think would be an injury to their business.

Mr. BRICK. I ask the gentleman this question: Would it not be a benefit for any proprietary medicine, whether it was made from the pharmacopœial remedies or from any other remedy, that the amounts of these drugs should be put upon the label, and without injuring anybody? Would it not be good for everybody to have that upon the label, and would it not be fair to everybody? I ask the gentleman from Illinois that.

Mr. MANN. It would be of benefit if the amount of opium contained in every proprietary medicine is put upon the label, and I believe it will be if this provision becomes law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: His provision provides that if it be a prescription of a regular physician, then, as I understand, this section does not apply?

Mr. MANN. It does not apply.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, now, of course, there are regular licensed physicians by hundreds of thousands.

Mr. MANN. We put the provision in reference to regular licensed physicians in because the only place where it would affect anybody is either the District of Columbia or the Territories of the United States. It does not affect and could not affect the regular trade in cities. It would not affect putting up a prescription in New York, St. Louis, or any other town in the country, because it is not interstate commerce. We did not think there was any reason for making a different rule in reference to the District of Columbia or with reference to the Territories. We found no special reason for requiring that the amount of narcotics should be put upon every physician's prescription. It would be a matter of considerable burden both to the pharmacist and the physician and without any practical value; and we did not believe there was any occasion for making an exception with reference to the District of Columbia.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask another question.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Suppose a man makes a patent medicine and sells it largely, but the prescription for it is prepared by a regular licensed physician. Why, under this provision, could he not sell it, not one prescription, but hundreds of thousands of prescriptons, and be protected, because his patent medicine would be the prescription of a regular licensed physician?

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. PERKINS. Why not?

Mr. MANN. Simply because it is not the prescription of a regular licensed physician.

Mr. PERKINS. A regular licensed physician makes the prescription for a cure for consumption, we will say. Can not that be sold to a thousand people as well as to one person?

Mr. MANN. It can not. A physician's prescription is the prescription in a particular case. That has been decided in the State courts.

Mr. FINLEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, in charge of the bill. Do you think it would be a hardship on the maker of proprietary and patent medicine to print on the label the ingredients contained in the medicine?

Mr. MANN. We gave consideration to that question, as to whether we should report in favor of requiring that every proprietary medicine offered for sale should contain a printed statement of the formula. We did not see any reason why it should be done, and we could see a number of reasons why it should not be required that a man who had a proprietary medicine should disclose to his competitors and to the trade his formula.

Mr. FINLEY. Is it not true that in some countries, notably in Germany, this is required to be done in all cases?

Mr. MANN. I am not able to inform the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. That is my information, and I only wished to draw out the fact if the gentleman did not think that the policy was a good one.

Mr. MANN. Well, personally, I do not know, but I would think so. Personally, I do not know but what I would stop most doctors' prescriptions; but I am very confident that the country has not yet reached the point where it wishes to have that done.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What is the real purpose of having this statement on the label? Is it to advise the purchaser as to the amount of alcohol or these different ingredients contained in the package?

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why is it that if this article is contained in the National Formulary you do not require the ingredients to be stated on the outside? Not one person in a thousand will ever see the National Formulary. I never saw one.

Mr. MANN. I presume not, and probably the gentleman never bought a National Formulary article.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know whether I did or not.

Mr. MANN. No; that is something that is sold to the trade. The medicine is bought by the druggists. They know what they are. The gentleman does not buy those except on a physician's prescription.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, I see. I wanted to understand it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What is the objection to having a statement of the contents on these National Formulary articles as well as the others?

Mr. MANN. I do not know that there is any special objection. The pharmacists have a national association. They have a council, and that council has agreed to require that there shall be stated upon the label of the packages, not only these narcotic medicines, but a great many other articles, so that the physician and the druggist may know what is contained in the article. I am not certain but that ought to be in the law, but it is a great deal broader than the provision we have brought in, and the provision we have brought in is exciting more opposition than anything else we have had.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I think this is the most important subject in this bill. I refer to the adulteration of drugs, more particularly to what are known as "patent medicines." The revelations made by Mr. Samuel Hopkins Adams, who has thoroughly investigated this subject, are simply appalling. I know the man very well. He is a constituent of mine, and he is a reliable man as well as a most thorough and painstaking investigator.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him long enough to add my voice to indorse his sentiment upon that question?

Mr. PAYNE. I am most glad to get the gentleman's indorsement. Now, the original text of this bill is plain. We can all understand what it means:

> Second. If the contents of the original package shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol therein, or of any opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance which may be contained therein.

There is no loophole there. It seems to me that there are some loopholes in the committee amendment. For instance:

> And be not the prescription of a regular licensed physician.

Now, I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state that it had been held over and over again that that meant a personal prescription to a patient and nothing more. But it seems to me we can not assume that. There are doctors and doctors. There are some rascals among the most noble of professions, the profession of the law. [Laughter.] There are doctors that will do most anything for money. There are doctors that will make most any kind of prescription, and in the investigation that Mr. Adams made he showed that when these patent medicine venders needed somebody to testify as to their respectability or to testify as to the propriety of the remedies which they were advertising they found doctors not only willing to testify that they were adequate and not harmful remedies, but to come up and father the prescription by which the remedies are foisted on the public. People take these without knowing what substances are contained in them or how much poison. They take it sometimes for the alcohol contained in it, and they found that there was more alcohol in the medicine than in the ordinary bottle of whisky of the same size.

Here they leave a loophole by the committee amendments for the prescription of a physician. Why not adhere to the original language of the bill, which seems to be plain and fully covers this proposition, rather than go out into the unknown field? I do not believe that these amendments were suggested by anyone who was anxious to have proper remedies when advertised as medicines.

I do not believe these amendments were suggested by those friendly to the medical profession; they were suggested by the friends of these infamous remedies that are often advertised and foisted on the public. I do not know where they came from, but I fear—the gentleman from Illinois points to his own brain. I can hardly credit his statement; and still he is the last man in the world whose statement I would not take. If he is the author of this, I hope he understands it fully, and I hope he is prepared, as far as he is concerned, to show that it fully covers the subject. I appeal again to the sober moment when he first framed the second section of this committee substitute, because I believe he has a plainer bill and has one that will cover and answer all the purposes, and in which there is no apparent loophole. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The original provision in the bill which the gentleman praises was one which I drew. After it was drawn, it seemed to me at first, as it does now to the gentleman from New York, to be unequivocal, to be without question or without doubt, and yet when I commenced to make inquiries of people who are not interested in the matter in any way as to what a poison was, I ascertained that no one knew what "other poisonous substances" would cover. Doctor Wiley, of the Bureau of Chemistry, and other gentlemen high in the profession told me that the expression was one itself of doubt, which from the start would lead not only to litigation unending, but to a confusion worse confounded in the drug trade; that nobody would know what was covered by the words "other poisonous substances," because the question of a substance being poisonous or not might depend on the quantity which was taken.

Mr. PAYNE. That explains the first part of the gentleman's amendment, but it does not throw any light on the other.

Mr. MANN. I haven't got to that yet.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if there is so much difficulty in determining what poisonous substances are, why not strike out the word "poisonous" and let everybody know all the substances in medicine, whether poisonous or otherwise. The gentleman made the assertion that we want to know what we are drinking and what we are eating. Why not let us know what we take for medicine?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that this is the first time that any provision looking in this direction has ever been brought before the House. There never has been a suggestion made, so far as I know, in Congress covering this question until this provision was brought in. All at once some of our good friends who have had their attention called to it want to go to the ends of the earth when they ought to know that reforms like this move somewhat slowly and that the attempt to get too much means that you get nothing. I would rather have the substance of the meat than to drop my meat while seeking for the shadow in the waters beneath me. [Laughter and applause.]

The other provision was suggested to me by an inquiry as to the effect when I asked various pharmacists of the city in reference to a provision of this sort, without their knowing anything about what was in the bill or what was proposed to be in the bill, and they said in making up the ordinary physician's prescription it would be practically impossible to place upon the little box or the label the whole quantity or contents each time, and that there was no occasion for it, in their judgment.

Mr. PAYNE. There would not any of that go into interstate commerce; that would be entirely local.

Mr. MANN. It would be controlled in the District of Columbia. The gentleman could not get a physician's prescription filled in the District of Columbia without having stated on the box or the label all of these things. And I say to the gentleman that that is the only reason this appears.

Mr. PAYNE. Why not, then, put in the language limiting it to physicians' prescriptions in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN. I don't know that there would be any objection to that.

Mr. PAYNE. That would carry out the gentleman's idea, and it would close this loophole which I think exists.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am frank to say to the gentleman that I did not believe personally, and I hardly believe yet, there is any loophole there. I certainly have no desire to leave any loophole of that kind, if there be such.

Mr. PAYNE. Of course the gentleman does not. We all understand that.

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman on that point that that part of the amendment did not come from anybody interested in the matter of proprietary medicines. The Proprietary Medicine Association did present to the committee an amendment which would have permitted them to use any of these narcotics in small quantities without placing that fact upon the label. We declined to accede to that request, but the rest of the amendment was never suggested by the association, and the Proprietary Medicine Association is bitterly opposed to that provision in the proposed amendment.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman modify his amendment by inserting the words "in the District of Columbia?"

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not think so at this time. Let that wait until we see what we can do in conference.

Mr. PAYNE. After this amendment is voted in there is no power to amend it. It would not then be in order. If it is done at all, it must be done now.

Mr. MANN. I think it is safer to let that wait. I am willing to consider the matter. It can be fixed in conference, if necessary.

Mr. PAYNE. It should be considered now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois refuses to accept that amendment, I submit to the committee that there is no other way except to vote his amendment down, and then he can offer it again with those words excluded, because if we vote this amendment into the bill it is out of order to try to amend it afterwards. A motion could be made to strike it out, but no other motion would be in order, and it can not be amended. If we accept the amendment just as the gentleman has written it, and he will not agree to modify it, the only way is to vote it down and see if the committee can not amend it.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to offer a suggestion to the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to proceed for a moment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would like to offer this suggestion to the gentleman from New York, as to whether an amendment of this sort would meet his objection, to insert, after the words "licensed physician," the words "to a person actually his patient?"

Mr. PAYNE. Possibly that would cover it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the words just suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by inserting the words suggested by the gentleman from West Virginia, and the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after "licensed physician," the words "to a person actually his patient."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's modifying his amendment as requested? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a word to the House about the committee amendment. I appreciate the good work which has been done by the committee, and I appreciate the intelligence and industry and the ability which the gentleman from Illinois has manifested; but it seems to me that his first opinion was far better, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has said, than his last. That is a perfectly simple, straightforward amendment, designed to compel every manufacturer of patent and proprietary medicines in the United States to put labels upon the packages stating that they contain poison, if they do contain poison. I desire to add to the tribute which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] has paid to Samuel Hopkins Adams, who, in Collier's Weekly, has given the result of the most careful, painstaking, intelligent, and valuable work in the study of a great evil that has ever been given to any similar subject in the history of the United States.

I know Mr. Adams. I know that he indorsed this bill in the language in which it came from the committee. As dairy and food commissioner of our State, I have had some experience in analyzing these medicines, and had occasion to know something about them, and I know that it is absolutely true that many of them were worthless, and a great number of them are of great damage to the public health, and that hundreds and thousands of the graves of this country have been filled because of the use of poisons which they contained, which the people have taken not knowing that they contained them. The general purpose of this bill is to protect the public health, and it is to secure honesty in trade and to enable people to know just exactly what they get.

This bill as originally reported from this committee provides for that, and I want to say another thing, that of the numerous poisons which are given in the committee amendment now before the House, not all the poisons that enter into these medicines are named. I have the authority of one of the best chemists in the United States for this statement. This bill as a whole is infinitely superior to the Heyburn bill, as the gentleman has said. Let us not take from it one atom of its excellence and virtue, and I ask this committee to vote down the committee amendment and accept the phraseology of the bill as the Interstate Commerce Committee first framed it in wisdom and in good faith.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think that the present section of the bill that the House is considering is the most important section in the whole bill. There is nothing that the people of the United States need protection against more than they do the poisons in proprietary medicines. Now, I think the gentleman from Illinois, in offering his amendment, has weakened his bill. I think it is leaving the door wide open to deceive the people and allow the people of the United States to be sold poisonous drugs. Now, as the matter has been illustrated to me, and as I understand it, it is simply this: That if a woman goes to a drug store to get medicine for her child and the druggist offers to sell her, after the passage of this bill, Mrs. Winslow's soothing sirup that has got opium in it, he would have to paste across that bottle a label stating that there is opium in that bottle, and she will refuse to buy it because she will not give the child opium, but the druggist will turn around and say, "Here is paregoric, which is just as good." Paregoric is one of those formulas that he can sell that is made up by the National Formulary.

Under the terms of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, although paregoric has opium in it, the very substance she does not want to give to her child, yet under the terms of this amendment there will be no guard against that; there will be nothing on the bottle to warn her that if she gives the child paregoric she will be giving it opium, and I say this amendment ought to be voted down and the door closed to any deception of that kind.

Mr. BRICK. Mr. Chairman, I understand, as a parliamentary inquiry, that if this amendment is adopted, presented by the committee, that no other amendment can be made under the rule. Is that right?

The CHAIRMAN. If this amendment is voted in, then this particular amendment can not be amended.

Mr. BRICK. Then it must stand as voted.

The CHAIRMAN. It stands unless that, including other distinct matter, should be stricken out.

Mr. BRICK. Under those circumstances, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, in the same line I want to make an inquiry. I want to know if the Chair's attention has been specially called to the special rule under which we are acting when he suggests we can not offer any amendment except such as comes from the committee? The Chair has already held we are to consider the committee amendments first, but shuts off our offering any amendment at all until they are through, and when they are through we will have confirmed that part of the bill and that will shut out offering any amendment unless to some other part of the bill. Now, that is not contemplated. I understand by the rule that we are to be allowed to try first and perfect the substitute. My point is, we are to perfect a substitute and then have the right (I agree we may do it in this way) to offer amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state after the committee amendments are offered, after members of the committee have been recognized who desire to offer amendments, the Chair will recognize any other gentleman desiring to offer an amendment.

Mr. KEIFER. To any part of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. To any part of the bill.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize gentlemen to offer amendments to strike out language that has been inserted in an amendment from the floor.

Mr. KEIFER. That would be the general rules, Mr. Chairman, but under the rule that we are acting we are shut out from offering an amendment. We have either got to vote it in or vote it out when it comes from the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of that opinion.

Mr. KEIFER. That excludes us in having any voice at all in perfecting any amendment coming from the committee, which I think is not contemplated by the rule of day before yesterday.

Mr. DALZELL. It is very easy for the committee to vote down this certain amendment, and then the original text may be perfected as the committee may see fit.

Mr. BRICK. That was just what I was asking the question about, which I think the House fully understands at the present time, and while one particular item here might have been perfected, there are several others, so for that reason I ask that the House vote down this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If the amendment should be voted down, other amendments may be offered.

Mr. OLMSTED. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. OLMSTED. This amendment is to strike out lines 16 to 21 and substitute other matter in the place of those lines. Now, that being done, would it be in order to strike out all from lines 11 to 21, including the part amended, and insert new matter?

The CHAIRMAN, The Chair is of the opinion that it would.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I think that if the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who criticised the committee amendment, had given more attention to this subject he would not have been so hurried in his commendation of the text and his reprobation of the amendment. The trouble with the gentleman is that he has only taken a cursory glance at the text of this amendment. It provides:

Or if it fails to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol therein.

Every tincture that is to be found in a drug store contains alcohol. Alcohol is necessary for the preservation of the drug. It is necesary as a solvent, in order that solution may be had. Now, under the original provision that the gentleman thinks is so admirable it was necessary to state the quantity or proportion of that alcohol in every one of those tinctures. Do you desire that? In the great majority of instances it is entirely unnecesary.

Probably the gentleman has in mind the purpose of preventing the sale of those drugs that beget and create the alcoholic habit. Under the provision as we have it in the amendment it seems to me that we can accomplish that purpose without putting the druggist and chemist to the necessity in every instance of stating the quantity of alcohol that is in the tincture, yet, if we follow the advice of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], that is what will have to be done.

Mr. DALZELL. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. DALZELL. Would not the objection the gentleman now suggests be met by adding the proviso contained in the committee amendment to the original text?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I think not, for the reason that was given by the gentleman from Illinois. Who is to define what is a poison? The dangerous poisons, those that we most frequently come in contact with, are named in this amendment of the committee, and we will have the good result of having them named here.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, they might be named in the original text and they might be inserted by the committee in the original text and still not leave this loophole about physicians.

Mr. HEPBURN. That is one of the difficulties which the committee met. All of the physicians jumped onto the other provision at once, and said that we were putting upon the chemists the necessity of stating the contents of their prescriptions in every case.

Mr. PAYNE. Would any physicians put it on?

Mr. HEPBURN. Very few, I think.

Mr. DALZELL. Why not insert in the original text the poisons that are named in your committee amendment?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is still another objection to the provision of the amendment. The burden of proof will be upon the defendant to establish the fact that no more of alcohol is used than is necessary as a solvent of the real ingredients.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman—he has seen advertisements, and I have, of people selling patent medicines who desire the people to write to them confidentially, state their symptoms, etc., and they will prescribe. It is very easy to have a physician to prescribe, and prescribe the formula that is meant by the advertisement, which is a patent medicine. Now, under this provision, I do not see why they would not go on without any label showing what the contents are.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, is not the number of those cases very rare?

Mr. PAYNE. Oh, I do not know but one single manufacturing house of that kind doing that kind of business now, but if they have got to say that on the label before going into business, why, there may be a great many of them.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a suggestion to the committee. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York made their suggestions covering this paragraph, I had written out an amendment which I think will meet every objection. Vote down the committee amendment—the last amendment—and adopt the following in its stead:

Second. If the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if it shall fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucane, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivation or preparation of any of such substances contained therein: Provided, however, That it may be proven as a complete defense to any accusation or prosecution for failure to state the quantity or proportion of alcohol as above required, that the quantity or proportion of alcohol contained in any package does not exceed the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active necessary constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment would preserve all of the better features of the last amendment proposed by the committee, and it would also remove from it the vitally objectionable feature relating to physicians' prescriptions, so forcibly pointed out by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. I can not conceive of a valid reason why any physician in the United States should be permitted upon his mere prescription to send to anybody anywhere cocaine or cannabis indica, or chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any other of the drugs which are lumped under the general head of poisons in the bill as originally presented unless there be a label on the package telling exactly what it contains. The trouble with the original bill is that it contains the words "or other poisonous substances." It thus leaves the prosecuting officer, or the jury, or somebody else to determine what would be properly included under the expression "other poisonous substances." The last amendment proposed by the committee omits the general language "other poisonous substances" and specifies what these substances are. Now, strike out "physicians' prescriptions," which words, in my judgment, should never have been in the bill, enumerate these poisons, and put in the proviso concerning the quantity or proportion of alcohol prescribed by the Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative, etc., and you have what would help to make an effective law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Second. If the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any of such substances contained therein: Provided, however, That it may be proven as a complete defense to any accusation or prosecution for failure to state the quantity or proportion of alcohol as above required that the quantity or proportion of alcohol contained in any package does not exceed the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active necessary constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package.

Mr. PAYNE. I notice that you leave out the words "or other poisonous substances." I presume there is a good reason for it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have now offered is the same amendment which I offered before, leaving out the provision with reference to the Pharmacopœia and prescription of a regular licensed physician, so that it will provide that the label must state the quantity or proportion of the drug contained. The gentleman from New York inquired why we leave out the words "other poisonous substances." I will say to the gentleman from New York that I have asked a great many persons who are familiar with such matters, who gave me a list of all the drugs the taking of which becomes a habit. These names include that entire list.

The reason we did not insert "other poisonous substances," as I have said before, is because no one knows what are poisonous substances. It might and would give rise to a great deal of litigation, not about anything that injures anyone at all, but possibly in the prosecution of the law, for the purpose of defining what were the poisonous substances. It could do no good. We have included by name all those which are habit forming, as I believe; at least, I consulted with the distinguished gentleman referred to by the gentleman from New York, Mr. Samuel Hopkins Adams, and have inserted more names of medicines than he could furnish to me. I consulted with a member of the National Council of Pharmacists in reference to the same matter. The number has been somewhat enlarged beyond the number of poisons originally given to us by the Bureau of Chemistry, and I think it includes all those which in any way become deleterious by their use.

Mr. PAYNE. I am well satisfied with the explanation of the gentleman.

Mr. ADAMS. I hope that the House will stay by the original language of this act. There is on reason on earth why that law can not be enforced. There are no practical difficulties in the way. I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the method of procedure, under this bill as originally drawn, is this: That an officer of the Government arrests somebody engaged in interstate commerce selling a proprietary medicine which contains poison of some kind, and he must go into court and establish that fact, and you have got to establish any fact in court when you take a man there.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The language of the original act is—

Or any opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Do you not think it is a great deal better to make the enumeration?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not think it is when the enumeration does not cover all possible contingencies, and the phrase "or other poisonous substance" does cover it; and if the administrative officers of this law have reason to believe that some article not enumerated here is poisonous, and they think they can prove it in court, then we have a law which can be enforced.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] is one of the strongest advocates of pure food and drugs, not only in this House, but in the country; but in this case he is mistaken. The original provision of the bill as we reported it, before we had given it as full consideration as we did afterward, is:

Opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance.

Now, the patent medicine men claim that the amount of these other substances which they use in their medicines is not poisonous, and it would become the duty of the Government under the original bill not only to establish the amount in them, but to establish, for instance, that the one-sixteenth of a grain of heroin to the ounce, which patent medicines use, is poisonous. They would need to establish that before each jury that tried a case, whereas, as the provision which we propose reads, the fact of guilt is established when you establish by analysis the presence of any portion of the drug in the medicine. That was the reason for the change; and although I know that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ADAMS] has no heart or sympathy with the proprietary medicine people engaged in the sale of opium or cocaine and these other poisonous substances, the people who are now selling acetanilid as headache medicine pray that the original amendment shall prevail.

Mr. YOUNG. I should like to ask the gentleman a question for information. As I understood the reading of this amendment, it went into the bill at page 21, at the end of line 2. Is that correct?

Mr. MANN. No; at page 20, line 16.

Mr. YOUNG. Then it is in lieu of the amendment that you formerly offered?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. I want to say that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] with reference to the attitude of the proprietary-medicine and patent-medicine people of the United States regarding this clause is a very great surprise to me. I know absolutely that if there is anything they fear in this bill it is the clause under discussion as first reported. There is no reason why an officer of the Government, administering that law, if he has reason to believe that any medicine of any kind contains poison, can not produce the specific evidence upon which he bases that reason, and there is no reason why he should not go into court and give it; and if he is right, the court will sustain him, as it should, and if he is wrong, the court will turn down his case, as it ought to do. This language is simple, direct, specific, possible of enforcement, will do injustice to no particular interest, and I hope every amendment will be voted down and the language of the original bill enacted into law.

Mr. OLMSTED. I should like just a moment to ask the gentleman from Illinois, the member of the Interstate Commerce Committee in charge of the bill, as it does not seem likely that within the time allowed under the rule any of us outside of that committee will have the opportunity to offer any amendments——

Mr. MANN. I think there will be opportunity.

Mr. OLMSTED. Not at this place in the bill, if the committee amendment shall be adopted. I ask whether you would have any objection to incorporating this as a part of your amendment:

That the quantity or proportion of opium or morphine need not be stated unless the proportion in such package contains more than two grains of opium or one-fourth grain of morphine to a fluid ounce, or, if a solid preparation, to an avoirdupois ounce.

I will say that this was suggested to me by an eminent and respectable druggist, for whose judgment and fairness I have a very high regard.

Mr. MANN. I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that that amendment, and even more along the same line, have been suggested to a great many people by a great many very eminent and respectable people engaged in the making of proprietary medicines, each one satisfied if the proportion of narcotics which he puts in his medicine is excepted from the bill. The committee is not willing to agree to the amendment which the gentleman suggests or to anything along that line.

Mr. OLMSTED. Where the amount is so small that it would do no harm, my proposition is to specify so small a proportion that any statement would be unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. That is exactly what the proprietors of these medicines say. Acetanilide would be another, and they claim that that is not a poison and it is used in more than 300 different remedies.

Mr. OLMSTED. My suggestion relates only to opium and morphine. It is a little unjust to the proprietors of medicines to say, in broad terms, that this contains poison if there is only a trace of it in it, and the limit can readily be so fixed.

Mr. MANN. We do not require them by the bill to say—although I am not sure that we ought not to do so—that it contains poison; we only require them to say that it contains, say, opium, and state the amount or proportion that they put in the medicine.

Of all the drugs of this kind put in medical preparations the two worst by long odds are morphine and opium, which the gentleman's amendment would except.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, that depends on the quantity—on the proportion contained in the medicine.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me, I understand that strychnine is a poison.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I believe so.

Mr. KEIFER. Would it be governed by your amendment as it is now? If anyone wanted to fall into the strychnine habit, would it be covered by this amendment?

Mr. MANN. One never falls into the strychnine habit unless he is getting ready to go to the grave.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, yes; they take it for the complexion, and use it all over the country. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It is certain that the gentleman from Ohio does not need to use either strychnine or arsenic for the best complexion in the House. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, at the end of line 2, insert "or, if the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed in whole or in part and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or, if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilide, or any derivative or preparation of any of such substances contained therein."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a proposition to insert practically the same amendment as to narcotic drugs, so as to provide that if they are put in food they shall be labeled to show the contents, it being feared that if they were driven out of the medical field they might attempt to put it up in the form of food and sell it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22 strike out lines 19 and 20 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, from time to time, to determine and make known standards of the various articles of food in compliance with the definitions and provisions of this act."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, most of the Members on the floor have a copy of the committee amendments. I did not offer the package amendment next because that would give rise to considerable debate, and I thought it might be well to run through some of the other amendments that probably would not cause debate.

The provision in the bill makes it the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable for the guidance of officials. Now, there was a fear that that provision of the bill as it was framed was conferring a legislative authority upon the Secretary which might render the provision unconstitutional, and hence we propose to say, following the opinion of the Supreme Court in the tea case, that for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the act the Secretary shall fix the standards in accordance with the provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois ask that the amendment which has been reported shall stand over?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I offer the amendment to be considered now.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it in order to offer a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The matter that we are considering is a substitute for Senate bill No. 88.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is a motion to strike out and insert.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out and insert is in order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The amendment, I understood, offered by the gentleman from Illinois is a motion to strike out and insert, and my recollection is that under the rule an amendment in the form of a substitute in the third degree is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment, just briefly. Mr. Chairman, the substitute I proposed to offer, if it had been in order, would have provided that the food provisions contained in the bill shall relate only to food for human consumption. I do not believe that the stringent provisions of this bill ought to be extended to hay and corn and oats, and numerous other kinds of foods for cattle, horses, hogs, dogs, and cats. Now, there is a provision in the bill that makes a bale of hay, for instance, that may contain any percentage of decomposed hay or any small percentage of decomposed oats adulterated within the meaning of the law. In section 5, page 18, in defining the term "food," defines it as follows:

The term "food" as used herein shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound.

It seems to me that provision will bring on all kinds of embarrassment. Among other provisions an article is declared to be adulterated if any substance has been mixed or packed with it so as to lower or reduce its quality or strength. I know something about the science of farming. If a little oat straw should be mixed in with a bale of hay, the food would be adulterated, and the farmer who produced it would be liable to prosecution under the provisions of this law, if he undertook to ship any of it out of the State. The sixth subdivision provides that if a product consists in whole or in part of a filthy, decomposed, or putrid animal or vegetable substance, etc.

Now, if there should be a small percentage of hay decomposed, like all farmers find at the bottom of a stack when they get ready to bale their hay, or in the threshing, it is adulterated within the meaning of this law, and the farmer that undertakes to send hay out of the State prepared in bales of that kind would be guilty of a crime. I do not believe this bill, with its stringent provisions, ought to be made applicable to food for horses, cattle, dogs, and hogs. I do not believe that the situation in the country requires any such drastic legislation to protect the food for farm animals, live stock, other animals aside from man. I was somewhat surprised to find that provision in the bill—"by man or other animals," and subsequent provisions seemed to lose sight of "other animals," but no exception whatever is made. I shall at the proper time offer a motion to strike out the words "or other animals," in the fifth section of the bill, and it was my purpose when I rose in opposition to this amendment to attempt to work in a substitute providing that the food provisions of the bill shall not be applicable to any kinds of foods except those for human consumption.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman has nothing to do with this amendment, and I call for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the gentleman is about to amend, but I submit that he should take these amendments up in order. The rule under which we are operating says we should operate under the five-minute rule, and therefore except by unanimous consent the gentleman can not go from page 22 to page 21 and then to 19 and then to some other page. I submit they should be taken up seriatim.

Mr. MANN. I understand the gentleman to be wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, as the Chair understands it and as the Chair has suggested, the gentleman can do that.

Mr. MANN. If it be the desire of Members of the House to take up the package amendment now, I am perfectly willing to do so, but I did not think the House would care to take that up to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, in line 13, after the word "Agriculture," insert the following: "for the purpose of aiding him in determining as to the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of any such preservative or substance."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know the scope of the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there was some question as to whether under the bill as it stood it became the duty of the board provided for in the bill to determine and finally settle the question as to the wholesomeness of preservatives or whether that board was merely advisory. It was the intention of the committee when first reporting the bill that the language meant that the special board appointed was merely advisory to the Secretary of Agriculture. The amendment that I offer now simply provides that without question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This is a very important section—one of the most important administrative sections in the bill—and I would like to know whether it is the understanding of the gentleman in charge of the bill that the standards provided in section 9, the section under consideration, are to be accepted as official and constitute the basis of criminal prosecution in the courts, or is the question of fact open for consideration in the courts?

Mr. MANN. Why, it is certainly open for consideration in the courts, but this is the basis for the criminal prosecution. It is absolutely necessary that there should be some standard fixed before anybody can determine on the part of the Government whether prosecution shall be inaugurated or not, but, of course, it finally rests with the court to determine whether, as a matter of fact, the article is adulterated or is unwholesome, under the provisions of the act.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then, an indictment or information would not be good under this bill, if it charged simply that a person failed to comply with the food or drug standard, as fixed by the law?

Mr. MANN. It would not.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. What does the phrase mean, in line 22, "and for the information of the courts?" If the standard is to be fixed officially and it is not to constitute a basis of an indictment or a penal prosecution, why do you say "for the information of the courts?"

Mr. MANN. That it may be introduced in evidence in the courts.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It is to be admissible in evidence, is it?

Mr. MANN. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not believe this section makes it admissible. It does not provide it shall be admissible in evidence.

Mr. MANN. I think "for information of the courts" will admit it in evidence when presented in proper form. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman, Does the gentleman undertake to make a certificate of the Secretary of Agriculture evidence against a defendant in a criminal case?

Mr. MANN. Evidence that that is the standard which has been fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture; not evidence that the person is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Mr. PAYNE. That is not involved in this amendment, is it?

Mr. MANN. It is not particularly involved in it.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, the gentleman from Indiana is talking about that which seems to be harmless. See if we can not get time to amend the other part of it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is not harmless; it has a good deal of significance when read in connection with other provisions.

Mr. PAYNE. It does not make much difference whether we get at this or not if we leave the other in——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, when we get to that part of the bill I will move to strike it out, because it is contrary to the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of every State in the Union.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And of every individual in the country.

Mr. GROSVENOR. If the gentleman will allow me a word, I think I can say to my friend——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The text as it stands; I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri take a copy of the bill and look at page 23: "It shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture, for the purpose of aiding him in determining as to the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of food." Now, that is all there is of it. It need not have been put there at all. He might have used their advice for any purpose. But in order to limit the Secretary of Agriculture so that he should not permit the board to become a finality the limitation is put and——

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It seems, by implication at least, to provide that the Secretary of Agriculture is to fix a standard which shall be a basis for criminal prosecutions——

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is true.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The text as it stands will not bear that construction, in my judgment—will not bear that interpretation. I certainly do not believe we ought to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the power to fix a standard and then convict a man of crime, fine him, and send him to prison because he does not comply with the standard. That would be department-made law.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I believe the law ought to provide that whoever sells forbidden kinds of foods or drugs or medicines may be amenable to the penal provisions in the bill,

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a suggestion?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will.

Mr. ADAMS. The object of this bill is to frame a law which will enable the Secretary of Agriculture to get all possible information, so that when he desires to prosecute he will have all of the information he can get. It does not confer any additional authority of law upon him.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to collect this information and fix standards for foods and drugs, among other things, for the information of the courts. What is the business of the courts in this connection? To try criminals, men who are put on trial for violating its provisions.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman permit me to answer the question? It does not make any difference whether the phrase "for the information of the court" goes in or not. This commission is established for the purpose of endeavoring to arrive at a series of correct standards as nearly as possible by scientific judgment for the information of the Secretary and for the purposes of prosecution. Now, when the Secretary of Agriculture goes into court and undertakes to try a case, the opinion of that commission comes in there simply as a part of the evidence, just as the gentleman from Illinois says. It is not conclusive. You can not make it conclusive.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is correct in his interpretation of the law, I have no criticism to make of it, but if this section of the bill will authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to fix a standard, the violation of which shall subject citizens to fine and imprisonment, then I object to it.

Mr. ADAMS. It does not.

Mr. PAYNE. Why does not my friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] let the amendment pass? It has no effect upon his proposition. After the committee amendments are agree to he can then make a motion.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will let it pass. I do not think I can help it in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, at the end of line 23, insert the following:

"Foods complying with the standards fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, as provided in this section, may bear upon the label the inscription 'United States Standard,' but such inscription, or words of similar import, shall not be used as descriptive of any article of food which does not comply with the standard so fixed, under penalty of being deemed misbranded under the provisions of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 26 strike out section 14 and insert as section 14 the following:

"The Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request from time to time, samples of foods and drugs which are being imported into the United States or offered for import, giving notice thereof to the owner or consignee, who may appear before the Secretary of Agriculture and have the right to introduce testimony, and if it appear from the examination of such samples that any article of food or drug offered to be imported into the United States is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or is otherwise dangerous to the health of the people of the United States, or is of a kind forbidden entry into, or forbidden to be sold or restricted in sale in the country in which it is made or from which it is exported, or is otherwise falsely labeled in any respect, the said article shall be refused admission, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall refuse delivery to the consignee and shall cause the destruction of any goods refused delivery which shall not be exported by the consignee within three months from the date of notice of such refusal under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may deliver to the consignee such goods pending examination and decision in the matter on execution of a penal bond for the amount of the full invoice value of such goods, together with the duty thereon, and on refusal to return such goods for any cause to the custody of the Secretary of the Treasury, when demanded, for the purpose of excluding them from the country, or for any other purpose, said consignee shall forfeit the full amount of the bond: And provided further, That all charges for storage, cartage, and labor on goods which are refused admission or delivery shall be paid by the owner or consignee, and in default of such payment shall constitute a lien against any future importation made by such owner or consignee."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is substantially an amendment that is already in the bill, but redrafted in conformity with the opinion of the Treasury Department in connection with various provisions.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I understand under this provision the Secretary of Agriculture has power to decide whether a cargo of goods imported from a foreign country is adulterated or misbranded, that his decision is final, and that the goods must be destroyed or exported and returned without any further investigation or power of review. That is true, is it not?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has about the same understanding of the matter that I have. That is the existing law.

[Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who fixes the invoice value?

Mr. MANN. The invoice value is first fixed by the person who makes the entry and, second, by the board of appraisers, which determines the invoice value if it is requested.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, if he gives a bond for the invoice value with the duty added, he takes the goods and sells them, provided he will pay the bond?

Mr. MANN. He may.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Although the goods are misbranded and fraudulent in every way, as well as poisonous?

Mr. MANN. It is within the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture to advise that that be done.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that that bond, in view of the fact that the undervaluation was apparently indulged in by the importer's false invoicing, ought to be very much larger than the face value, when it will permit him to take false, fraudulent, and poisonous goods and sell them at that invoice value?

Mr. MANN. I do not think that if it were made ten times more than the value we could recover any more than the value. The amount was stated by the Agricultural officials who have charge of the existing law which covers the case, and the form of the proposition was suggested by the Treasury Department, which deals with the matter.

Mr. PAYNE. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest, "appraised value" would be better than "invoice value."

Mr. MANN. The "invoice value" is the suggestion of the Treasury Department.

Mr. PAYNE. With all due deference, "appraised value" would be better.

Mr. MANN. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the investigations the gentleman made, does he know of any instance in which food was delivered under the provisions of this existing law, the bond given, and the product sold, and the goods were afterwards adjudged to be improperly imported?

Mr. MANN. The law as it now exists does not provide for the delivery of the goods; but the Agricultural Department requested that provision be inserted in the law, because they said in many cases it was a great hardship to hold goods in storage instead of delivering them to the parties.

Mr. HINSHAW. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, because I do not know that I understand this provision yet. If these goods are refused admission, then the entryman may give a bond, and the bond stands in lieu of the goods. Now what may he do with the goods?

Mr. MANN. He may do whatever he pleases with them.

Mr. HINSHAW. He can not bring them into this country.

Mr. MANN. They are already in the country, provided the Secretary of the Treasury delivers them to him, which he is not required to do, and probably will not do, unless it is suggested that it should be done by the Department which has charge of that matter; and the Agricultural Department and the Treasury Department have authority under this section to stop the goods. If the Agricultural Department advises the goods be turned over by the Secretary of the Treasury to the consignee, it will be done upon giving a bond; and if the goods finally, for any reason—usually misbranding—are held not to be subject to import, the man must either return the goods or pay to the Government the full value. I think it sufficiently guards against bringing goods into the country which are adulterated.

Mr. HINSHAW. In the meantime the adulterated goods may have been sold.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. HINSHAW. As pure goods.

Mr. MANN. That is true. We take that chance.

Mr. HINSHAW. This is simply a penalty, but that does not protect the man that bought them.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 28 strike out section 16 and insert as section 16 the following:

"SEC. 16. That this act shall be in force and effect from and after its passage: Provided, however, That no penalties herein named for misbranding shall be imposed until after the expiration of eighteen months from the passage of the act, except the penalties provided in section 14."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about a provision here. The section, in effect, says that when the goods have been properly examined and passed with the regular label on the package, and the package gets into the State and comes in there in the regular, original, unbroken package, would it interfere with the power of the State to take charge of it if it had spoiled? Suppose that in transmission it becomes deleterious; suppose it has undergone some change by reason of the atmosphere or otherwise; suppose it is in a condition of fermentation, or from any condition that you may discover by looking at it or otherwise examine it it had become deleterious. Is there anything in this bill that prevents the State from absolutely taking charge and destroying it?

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to my friend from Tennessee that if it becomes fermented or deleterious to health it at once becomes subject to the provisions of the act, and is covered by that provision of the section.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What provision?

Mr. MANN. It is deleterious goods.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose it becomes deleterious of its own act while in transmission?

Mr. MANN. Then it does not fully comply with the provisions of the act.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. In that condition, does the State take charge of it, or the Federal Government?

Mr. MANN. Either one.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am afraid your section does not say that.

Mr. MANN. We do not need to say that to the State authorities. They have control, although the section does expressly provide against interfering with the police powers of the State. The United States authorities would have control of it if they obtain possession of it first. It would be a violation of both the Federal and State law, if there be a State law on the subject. It is a violation of this law, in any event.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. With that explanation I feel more satisfied than I was. I want to help the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CURRIER, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 88, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16290. An act to modify the requirements of the act entitled "An act to promote the education of the blind," approved March 3, 1871;

H. R. 15513. An act to declare and enforce the forfeiture provided by section 4 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States;"

H. R. 20210. An act to authorize the city of St. Louis, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River;

H. R. 118. An act to amend sections 713 and 714 of "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved January 31 and June 30, 1902, and for other purposes;

H. R. 20119. An act to authorize the village of Oslo, Marshall County, Minn., to construct a bridge across the Red River of the North;

H. R. 19181. An act to grant a certain parcel of land, part of the Fort Robinson Military Reservation, Nebr., to the village of Crawford, Nebr., for park purposes; and

H. R. 16785. An act giving preference right to actual settlers on pasture reserve No. 3 to purchase land leased to them for agricultural purposes in Comanche County, Okla.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4109. An act to increase the efficiency of the Bureau of Insular Affairs of the War Department; and

S. 6146. An act to authorize the Back River Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the west or smaller division of the Ohio River from Wheeling Island, West Virginia, to the Ohio shore.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 544. An act to provide for the erection of a public building in the city of Great Falls, Mont.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 3459. An act for the relief of John W. Williams;

H. R. 4580. An act for the relief of Blank & Parks, of Waxahachie, Tex.;

H. R. 5221. An act for the relief of Edward King, of Niagara Falls, in the State of New York;

H. R. 18600. An act to amend section 10 of an act of Congress approved June 21, 1898, to make certain grants of land to the Territory of New Mexico, and for other purposes;

H. R. 18536. An act providing for the subdivision of lands entered under the reclamation act, and for other purposes;

H. R. 9343. An act providing for the resurvey of certain townships of land in the county of Baca, Colo.; and

H. R. 16472. An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

MASSACRES OF JEWS IN RUSSIA.

Mr. COUSINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration Senate joint resolution 68, expressing the sympathy of the people of the United States with the Hebrews on account of the massacre of members of their race in Russia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the following Senate joint resolution and consider the same at this time. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the people of the United States are horrified by the report of the massacre of Hebrews in Russia, on account of their race and religion, and that those bereaved thereby have the hearty sympathy of the people of this country.

Mr. COUSINS. I move the adoption of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

[Mr. GOLDFOGLE addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter.]

The joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. COUSINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WATER SUPPLY, BUFFALO, N. Y.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 6493) to authorize the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to construct a tunnel under Lake Erie and Niagara River, to erect and maintain an inlet pier therefrom, and to construct and maintain filter beds for the purpose of supplying the city of Buffalo with pure water; a similar House bill being on the Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, That it shall be lawful for the city of Buffalo, in the State of New York, to construct and maintain a tunnel under Lake Erie, Niagara River, Black Rock Harbor, and the United States lands known as Fort Porter, extending from a point 1,000 feet, more or less, southeasterly of the Horseshoe Reef light 11,000 feet to the present pumping station of the city of Buffalo, and to erect and maintain an inlet pier therefrom, said inlet pier to be located not more than 1,100 feet southeasterly of the present Horseshoe Reef light. Also to construct and maintain filter beds between the new channel in Black Rock Harbor and Bird Island pier, and extending from the northerly line of Hudson street produced, along the line of the new channel not more than 3,300 feet: Provided, That the top of the said tunnel shall be located at least 40 feet below mean lake level, and that the city of Buffalo shall maintain a light from sunset to sunrise on the inlet pier at its own expense.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. I should like to ask by what committee that bill is reported?

Mr. RYAN. It is reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and is approved by the Secretary of War.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Are the suggestions of the Department embodied in this bill?

Mr. MANN. They are.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. And there were no objections by the War Department?

Mr. MANN. There were none.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill was put in form by General Mackenzie, the Chief of Engineers.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, the corresponding House bill (H. R. 20248) was ordered to lie on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report and statement on the District of Columbia appropriation bill (H. R. 18198) for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

FORTIFICATIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the fortifications appropriation bill (H. R. 14171) and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report on the fortifications appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14171) "making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 4.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2 and 5, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "five hundred thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum named in the last line of said amendment insert "one hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "four hundred thousand dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

WALTER I. SMITH,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Managers on the part of the House.

GEO. C. PERKINS,
F. E. WARREN,
JNO. W. DANIEL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House, at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14171) making appropriations for fortifications, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon and submitted in the accompanying conference report on each of the Senate amendments, namely:

On amendment No. 1: Appropriates $500,000 instead of $600,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $310,000, as proposed by the House, for the purchase, manufacture, and test of mountain, field, and seacoast cannon.

On amendment No. 2: Inserts the provision proposed by the Senate, making available an unexpended balance of $39,302.16 for the alteration and maintenance of seacoast batteries.

On amendment No. 3: Appropriates $165,000 instead of $125,000, as proposed by the Senate, for the erection and equipment of a powder factory.

On amendments Nos. 4 and 5: Appropriates $260,000 for the construction of seacoast batteries in the Hawaiian and Philippine islands, instead of $600,000, as proposed by the House, for seacoast batteries in said islands.

On amendment No. 6: Appropriates $400,000, instead of $565,000, as proposed by the Senate, and $200,000, as proposed by the House, for seacoast cannon for coast defense for the insular possessions.

The bill as finally agreed upon appropriates $5,053,993, being $215,000 more than as it passed the House, $225,000 less than as it passed the Senate, $1,693,900 less than the law for the current year, and $3,899,119.90 less than the estimates submitted to Congress.

WALTER I. SMITH,
J. WARREN KEIFER,
JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, is this a complete and unanimous agreement?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. It is.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SMITH of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

OSAGE INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I present conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 15333) for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, for printing in the RECORD under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The conference report and statement will be printed under the rule.

LANDS OF THE MENOMINEE INDIANS, WISCONSIN.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I present conference report and statement on the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The report and statement will be printed under the rule.

PURE-FOOD LEGISLATION.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an opinion of the attorney-general of the State of New York on pure-food legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The opinion is as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, ATTORNEY-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Albany, March 21, 1906.

To the honorable the COMMISSIONER OF AGRICULTURE,
Albany, N. Y.

SIR: You have called to my attention the details concerning certain food products, and requested by opinion in regard to the provisions of article 11 of the agricultural law, familiarly known as the "pure-food law."

Several hearings have been held, at which your department has been represented, as well as attorneys for manufacturers and grocers, and also committees of wholesale and retail grocers' associations.

The interpretation of this statute is of importance for the purpose of appropriately enforcing the law, and also in order that the public, whether manufacturers, venders, or purchasers, may have settled rules by which they may be guided.

I may say at the outset that it is not possible to lay down any fixed rules of interpretation which would be applicable to every case, in connection with this statute, for the reason that in practical operation there are so many different propositions presented in relation to the adulteration or misbranding of food products.

However, I shall endeavor to analyze the statute to the extent, at least, of expressing my opinion on certain general lines, so that the uncertainty which now exists may in some degree be relieved.

The act is entitled "An act to amend the agricultural law relative to the sale, adulteration, or misbranding of food and food products." (Laws 1903, chapter 524.)

It deals with food which is adulterated and food which is misbranded.

It has for its two general purposes, first, the prevention of the manufacture and sale of food which is injurious or deleterious, and second, the safeguarding of the public against misrepresentation or deception.

ADULTERATION.

The statute describes an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated. Briefly stated, the purpose is to prevent (1) the addition of injurious or deleterious ingredients; (2) the reduction in quality or strength of an article of food so that such product thus reduced shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser; (3) substitution for purposes of deception, and (4) the abstraction of a valuable constituent of an article of food for purposes of deception.

In other words, section 165, from subdivision "first" to "sixth," inclusive, has to do with the quality, strength, character, and genuineness of food. The subdivisions of the section to which I have just referred are not difficult of interpretation. If an article of food contains any added poisonous ingredient or any ingredient which may render such article injurious to the health of the person consuming it, or if it consists of decomposed animal or vegetable substance or contains methyl or wood alcohol or methylated preparations therefrom, such article is to be deemed adulterated under the statute, and it is necessary only to show the existence of these injurious ingredients or substances in order to establish an offense against subdivisions fourth, fifth, and sixth of section 165.

If the substance be reduced so as to injuriously affect its quality or strength, or be substituted wholly or in part for an article of food, or if any valuable constituent of an article has been wholly or in part abstracted, then, in order that an article of food shall be deemed adulterated within the meaning of the statute, it must also appear that the article or product, when sold or offered for sale, shall deceive or tend to deceive the purchaser.

Without giving an illustration under each of these subdivisions, I may call your attention to the case of People v. Park (60 App. Div., 255). Here a substance was sold under the name of Eiffel Tower Lemonade. The box, circulars, and advertisements were such as to lead purchasers to believe that they were buying a preparation which, when dissolved, would be a lemonade, and, therefore, that the juice of the lemon was a substantial ingredient of the preparation.

It appeared that such was not the case, and that there was but 5 per cent of oil of lemon, which is made from the yellow rind, and not made from the juice. Thereupon the court held that this preparation was "an imitation or simulation of lemonade" calculated to deceive the purchaser, and therefore adulterated within the provisions of section 41 of the health law then in force.

MISBRANDING.

The statute sets forth under what circumstances an article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded.

An article may be both misbranded and adulterated, but I shall consider under this heading only the question of misbranding.

The purpose of this part of the statute was to prevent fraud and deception in regard to articles which do not necessarily contain injurious or deleterious ingredients, but which are so placed before the public that the public is led to believe that it is purchasing one thing, when, in fact, it is purchasing something else, or something of the same kind, but inferior in character and quality.

After defining under what circumstances an article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded, the statute provides for certain exceptions in the following language:

"Provided, That an article of food which does not contain any added poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded in the following cases:

"First. In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as articles of food, under their own distinctive names, and not included in definition first of misbranded articles of food in this section.

"Second. In the case of articles labeled, branded, or tagged so as to plainly indicate that they are mixtures, compounds, combinations, imitations, or blends: Provided, That the same shall be labeled, branded, or tagged so as to show the character and constituents thereof: And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their trade formulas, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation."

The difficult question, at the outset, is to determine the meaning of the exception numbered "first," and this involves an interpretation of the phraseology "their own distinctive names" when read with the rest of the statute.

It is a familiar rule of construction that the intention of the legislature must be ascertained from the whole structure of the act, and that is the rule which must be here applied.

It will be noted that this exception applies not only to mixtures or compounds, which may be now known as "articles of food" under their own distinctive names, but also to those which may be so known from time to time hereafter.

It is evident, therefore, that the legislature realized that, after the enactment of the law, names would be invented for compounds or mixtures which would designate a particular preparation which the public could distinguish by name from any other preparation. It is likewise to be remembered that the legislature was not referring to fundamental foods, such as milk, beef, fruit, vegetables, etc., but to compounds or mixtures of different articles of food.

It seems to me that the exception, therefore, was intended to apply to compounds or mixtures having arbitrary names of a character which would not, in any way, mislead, but which, by usage, were intended to indicate a food that could be distinctly identified by name in the public mind.

For instance, to coin a word for purposes of illustration, let us assume that "Sahara" was a name used for a powder. Assume that the ingredients of this powder were not harmful or deleterious in any way, and that, by the addition of some water, the powder could be made into a jelly dessert. The word "Sahara" would not deceive any person. It would not indicate the constituent parts of the food and the person purchasing "Sahara" would purchase merely a powder composed of harmless ingredients which could be made into a dessert upon the addition of water in the proportions and in the manner described upon the package.

It is urged that, assuming these premises to be correct, nevertheless, the public should be advised as to the contents of this powder. It is said, even though the powder may be composed of harmless ingredients, such, for example, as sugar, calves'-foot jelly, and a wholesome herb, that the public should know these ingredients, because, for instance, some person may be nauseated by anything containing sugar. (This combination may not be scientifically correct, but I use it for lay illustration.)

It seems to me, however, that a State health law can not be sustained upon any such theory. The police power of the State is exercied to safeguard public health and prevent deception, but that does not mean, where no misrepresentations are held out and no deception is practiced, that a statute can go to the extent of legislating for the exception rather than for the rule. In considering foods (as distinguished from medicines) we must have in mind that a food is regarded as healthful which can be safely eaten by the mass of the people, and although sugar, for instance, may be unhealthful or distasteful to some, it is recognized as healthful food for all but the exceptions.

When, therefore, a harmless article is sold under an arbitrary name and put up with labels or in packages in such a way as to make no misrepresentations, such an article is sold under "its own distinctive name" and comes within the exception of the statute.

At the time of the enactment of this statute many such foods, known to the public by their peculiar names, were on the market, and it was doubtless intended that the property rights thus acquired should not be disturbed wherever these foods were not composed of ingredients which were in any manner injurious or deleterious, and provided they were sold under names which were not misleading.

In any event, the question is not so clear as to authorize a construction which might do grave injustice in the case of products not misleading and not harmful to the public health.

So far as I can ascertain, the words "own distinctive name" in this connection have not been judicially construed. The same language is used in substance in the bill now pending in Congress, and even the committee to which it was referred has not a settled view of the meaning of this term. (See Report of Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce No. 2118, House of Representatives, 59th Cong., 1st sess., under date of March 7, 1906.)

It seems to me, therefore, that the interpretation to be given to the phrase "their own distinctive names" is the one which I have heretofore indicated.

The exception "Second," relating to articles labeled, etc., so as to plainly indicate that they are mixtures, etc., applies, in my opinion, to mixtures, compounds, combinations, imitations, or blends which have not a distinctive name in the sense of an arbitrary name, or which from their name, label, brand, or tag indicate that the constituent element of the mixture, compound, combination, imitation, or blend is some known substance.

The object of this portion of the statute was that where a person was buying a mixture, compound, etc., represented by label, brand, or tag to be composed in part of a known food, that such person should be informed as to the constituent elements of such mixture, compound, etc.

To illustrate, using the word "Sahara" above referred to: As I have previously stated, "Sahara" standing by itself could deceive no one, but if the preparation of "Sahara" was sold as "Sahara calves' foot jelly," and the labels or brands were calculated to convey to the mind of the purchaser that with the addition of water "Sahara" would make calves' foot jelly, then the purchaser should be informed that in addition to the calves' foot jelly there were also, as constituent elements of the food, sugar and a wholesome herb, naming it.

If goods are sold as "Sahara strawberry jam," and there was only a certain percentage of strawberry juice in the preparation, the intent of the statute was that the purchaser should know what other constituents entered into the compound or mixture, to wit, the jam.

Thus, for instance, it should be shown that the jam consisted of strawberries, granulated sugar, and apples. Some other strawberry jam, so called, might consist of strawberries, granulated sugar, and peaches, and the purchaser would thus be informed, in accordance with the statute, as to "the character and constituents" of the compound, mixture, etc.

The addition of the word "Sahara" to the other words "strawberry jam" does not make "Sahara strawberry jam" a distinctive name within exception "First" of the statute. The point is that strawberry jam, with whatever prefix or other description, conveys to the mind of the ordinary purchaser that the mixture or compound is made of strawberry juice and sugar, and does not convey to the mind of the purchaser that there is another constituent or ingredient, to wit, apple or peach or whatever it may be.

I have endeavored to make clear that when the public buys "Sahara," a jelly powder, no representation is made as to the contents of that food, and so long as the food is harmless it can be sold without disclosing the constituents thereof, because it has its own distinctive name within the meaning of the statute. When, however, the public buys "Sahara strawberry jam," the purchase is made because it is a strawberry jam, and the word "Sahara" merely indicates a particular brand of the compound or mixture, strawberry jam.

Let me illustrate further. Suppose that upon the package in which "Sahara," a jelly powder, is sold there is also added the word "strawberry" or the words "strawberry flavor." The intention is to convey to the public mind that the flavoring is obtained from the strawberry. If, as a matter of fact, no strawberry is used, but the flavoring is acquired through some vegetable compound or chemical process, then it becomes the duty of the vender to give the constituents of the flavoring or to otherwise make clear by label, etc., that the strawberry flavoring is artificial.

It is difficult to elaborate with illustrations. Suffice it to say, that the general rule on this branch of the subject may be stated as follows: That where the article of food is held out to the public in such manner that the ordinary purchaser would be deceived, then that such article is misbranded within the meaning of the statute.

In relation to the disclosures of trade formulas the statute provides that these formulas need not be disclosed in the case of proprietary foods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients, except in so far as the provisions of the act may require it to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation. A proprietary food may be defined as a food which is the property of a particular person or persons by virtue of character of combination, or name or method of presenting to the public by label, brand, tag, etc.

It is difficult to define under what circumstances it would be necessary, under the act, to disclose a trade formula. Such disclosure would depend upon the facts of each particular case. It might be that the food preparation had an acid, which in very small quantities might be harmless, and yet be harmful in large proportions, and it might be necessary, in order to protect the public, to require the disclosure of the formula.

There is another illustration of importance which may be made in connection with this part of the act. Let us take the constituent elements of "Sahara" above referred to, to wit, sugar, calves' foot jelly, and a wholesome herb. Suppose that the herb had the flavor of the strawberry and the preparation was sold as "Strawberrine." The public would be thus led to believe that the strawberry flavor in the preparation came from the strawberry fruit.

Although the preparation itself was not deleterious to health, yet there would be a deception, against which the statute is intended to safeguard, and thus the same preparation, which could be sold under the arbitrary name of "Sahara," could not be lawfully sold under the name of "Strawberrine" unless the character and constituents of "Strawberrine" were so clearly indicated upon the label, brand, or tag as to prevent deception.

PRESERVATIVES.

I am of the opinion that it was the intention of the statute that the character and constituents should be given of all preservatives.

COLORING MATTER.

When artificial coloring is used and such coloring is composed of harmless substances, I am of the opinion that the label, brand, etc., should show that the coloring is artificial, and that in such case the manufacturer has the choice of using some such phrase as "artificially colored," or of setting forth on the label, tag, etc., the constituents of the coloring matter. In any event, it must be made clear by either of the methods just referred to that the coloring is artificial and not natural.

I think that the foregoing sets forth with sufficient detail the general propositions in relation to the interpretation of this statute. Of course whether an article is misbranded within the terms of the statute, as construed herein, must depend upon the whole situation—the name, the label, the brand, the tag, the advertisement—in brief, the manner in which the article of food is held out to the public.

I may say, in conclusion, that, if it is practicable, it would be wise for your Department to pass upon the names, labels, brands, tags, etc., wherever request is made, in good faith, so to do by manufacturers or venders of foods.

In view of the uncertainty which has prevailed in regard to the interpretation of this statute, I think you are entirely justified in giving dealers a reasonable time to recall any misbranded goods, provided that such goods are not adulterated so as to contain ingredients harmful to health or are not imitations or substitutions of other foods calculated to deceive the public.

Opinions of this office from time to time in specific cases will serve to make clear the general propositions here set forth.

Yours, respectfully,

JULIUS M. MAYER,
Attorney-General.

NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reprint of the bill H. R. 18024, with Senate amendments numbered, the Niaraga Falls bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BURTON of Ohio. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 20266, an act to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the condemnation of lands or easements needed in connection with works of river and harbor improvements at the expense of persons, companies, or corporations," approved May 16, 1906, on the Speaker's table, and I move that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. BURTON of Ohio, Mr. BISHOP, and Mr. BANKHEAD.

REPRINT OF IMMIGRATION BILL.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill H. R. 4403, as last reported, and of the last report. It is the immigration bill, and the supply is entirely exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the reprint of the bill and report referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD, by unanimous consent, was given leave of absence indefinitely.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 48 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of the journal of the House of Delegates of Porto Rico, for the second session of the third legislative assembly—to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

A letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, submitting a report on the improvement of the Anacostia Flats—to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig Delaware, James Dunphy master—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the schooner Nancy, James Stephenson, master—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the ———, ———, master—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. GROSVENOR, from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 6355) concerning licensed officers of vessels, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4993); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16804) providing for the use of $3,000,000 of the money that would otherwise become a part of the reclamation fund for the drainage of certain lands in North Carolina and Virginia, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 4994); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas: A bill (H. R. 20354) for the enlargement of the public building at Hot Springs, Ark.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. VOLSTEAD: A bill (H. R. 20355) to authorize drainage of certain lands in the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HAMILTON: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 178) providing for the improvement of the harbor at South Haven, Mich.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 179) providing for the improvement of a certain portion of the Mississippi River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 23, 1906.

Prayer by Rev. JOHN VAN SCHAICK, Jr., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. LODGE, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

UNLADING OF BONDED MERCHANDISE.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 7099) to amend section 2871 of the Revised Statutes.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 7, after the word "steamship," to insert "or other conveyance;" in line 8, after the word "steamship," to insert "or other conveyance;" on page 2, line 1, after the words "license to," to insert "lade or;" in line 2, after the word "vessel," to insert "or other conveyance;" in line 5, after the word "vessel," to insert "or other conveyance;" in line 11, after the word "steamship," to insert "or other conveyance;" in line 12, after the words "from her," to insert "or other conveyance;" and, in line 22, after the words "superintend the," to insert "lading or;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2871 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2871. Upon arrival at any port in the United States of a steamship or other conveyance from a foreign port or place, or upon the arrival of a steamship or other conveyance from another port in the United States belonging to a line designated by the Secretary of the Treasury as a common carrier of bonded merchandise, the collector of customs, with the concurrence of the naval officer, where there is one, upon or after the issuing of a general order, shall grant, upon proper application therefor, a special license to lade or unlade the cargo of said vessel or other conveyance at night—that is to say, between sunset and sunrise; but before any such special license is granted the master, agents, or consignees of the vessel or other conveyance shall execute and deliver to the collector a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by him, conditioned to indemnify and save the collector harmless from any and all losses and liabilities which may occur or be occasioned by reason of the granting of such special license. And any liability of the master or owner of any such steamship or other conveyance to the owner or consignee of any merchandise landed from her or other conveyance shall not be affected by the granting of such special license or of any general order, but such liability shall continue until the merchandise is properly removed from the dock whereon the same may be landed. The collector, under such general regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, shall fix a uniform and reasonable rate of compensation for like service, to be paid by the master, owner, or consignee whenever such special license is granted, and shall collect and distribute the same among the inspectors assigned to superintend the lading or unlading of the cargo."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

JOURNAL OF PORTO RICO.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, a copy of the journal of the house of delegates of Porto Rico for the second session of the third legislative assembly of Porto Rico; which was referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Nancy, James Stephenson, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel brig Delaware, James Dunphy, master; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

S. 6493. An act to authorize the city of Buffalo, N. Y., to construct a tunnel under Lake Erie and Niagara River, to erect and maintain an inlet pier therefrom, and to construct and maintain filter beds for the purpose of supplying the city of Buffalo with pure water; and

S. R. 68. Joint resolution expressing the sympathy of the people of the United States with the Hebrews on account of the massacres of members of their race in Russia.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGES.

Mr. BERRY. I report back from the Committee on Commerce, without amendment, the bill (S. 6483) to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa," and I submit a report thereon. This is a bill the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] is very anxious to have passed. In his name I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at this time.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON AND WESTERN MARYLAND RAILROAD.

Mr. WHYTE. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12086) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company," to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER DAM.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19431) permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River between the counties of Stearns and Sherburne, in the State of Minnesota, to report it favorably without amendment, and I submit a report thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FRED DICKSON.

Mr. SMOOT. I report back favorably from the Committee on Claims, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 9528) to reimburse Fred Dickson for loss of his tools during the fire which destroyed the engine house at Fort Duchesne, Utah, September 19, 1902, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay Fred Dickson $155.65.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CODE PREPARED BY THE STATUTORY REVISION COMMITTEE.

Mr. FULTON. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of Laws to report favorably the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, which was referred to that committee on the 20th instant.

I desire to say that there is a provision in the resolution providing for the payment of the expenses from the contingent funds of the Senate and of the House. I understand, therefore, that the resolution will have to be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws recommends an amendment, striking out "four" and substituting "five," in line 3; so as to make it read "five Senators." I wish to inquire whether the amendment can be acted on before the resolution goes to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, before the word "Senators," strike out "four" and insert "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That a joint special committee be appointed, consisting of five Senators to be appointed by the Vice-President and five Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker, to examine, consider, and submit to Congress recommendations upon the revision and codification of laws prepared by the Statutory Revision Commission heretofore authorized to revise and codify the laws of the United States; and that the said joint committee be authorized to sit during the recess of Congress and to employ necessary clerical and other assistance; to order such printing and binding done as may be required in the transaction of its business, and to incur such expense as may be deemed necessary, all such expense to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

GRAND LODGE INDEPENDENT ORDER OF ODD FELLOWS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6448) to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask for its present consideration. It will take but a moment.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESA VERDE NATIONAL PARK.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 5998) creating the Mesa Verde National Park was read twice by its title.

Mr. PATTERSON. I have called the attention of the Committee on Public Lands to that bill, and I am authorized by the committee to request its immediate consideration and passage. I desire to say in addition that a similar bill passed the Senate on the 9th of April and is in the House. If this bill passes I will then ask the recall of Senate bill 3245 and its indefinite postponement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask that Senate bill 3245, creating the Mesa Verde National Park, be recalled from the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, with a view to its indefinite postponement when it is returned.

GUN CARRIAGE FOR RIPLEY, TENN.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 160) authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a certain gun carriage to the mayor of the city of Ripley, Lauderdale County, Tenn., to report it favorably without amendment. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK] to the joint resolution.

Mr. CARMACK. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 6516) for the relief of the estate of Q. K. Underwood, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 6517) granting an increase of pension to William C. Hall; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6518) granting an increase of pension to William H. Stiles; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming introduced a bill (S. 6519) to revise and amend the United States Statutes relating to the commitment of United States prisoners to reformatories of States; which was read wice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MALLORY introduced a bill (S. 6520) to correct the naval record of Francis F. Thuellin, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BRANDEGEE introduced a bill (S. 6521) granting a pension to Abbie J. Daniels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. CARTER submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to reexamine the enrollment records of the Five Civilized Tribes, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. FULTON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 to complete the surveys of the lands in the Klamath Indian Reservation, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15506) authorizing the patenting of certain lands to school district No. 57, Nez Perces County, Idaho.

Mr. LONG. Is the morning business finished?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has not been concluded.

Mr. PROCTOR. I shall have to object to the consideration of anything but the routine morning business. The agricultural appropriation bill has been waiting for some time.

Mr. HEYBURN. A number of bills have been passed by unanimous consent.

Mr. PROCTOR. I shall have to object until the agricultural appropriation bill is sent to conference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

DEBTS OF SANTO DOMINGO, HAITI, AND COSTA RICA.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, at the last session of Congress the Senate passed a resolution for the printing as a Senate document of certain statements made from the Thirty-first Annual Report of the Council of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders for the years 1904 and 1905. That related more particularly to the debt of Santo Domingo and Haiti, and perhaps of Costa Rica.

I have now extracts from the same paper of a later date and some other extracts, which I desire to have printed in the RECORD and also as a document, for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the Senate the opinion and the attitude assumed by the highest financial authorities in Europe in respect of our situation in regard to the debts of what we might call the "bankrupt States of America."

The paper that we printed last year was of immense service, I think, to the Government and people of the United States and the Senate, and I wish now to print in the RECORD and also to have printed as a document the following:

COSTA RICA DEBT.

1. Extract from the Times, London, June 2, 1905. Money market article. (Page 13.)
2. From the Financial News, London, June 3, 1905. Editorial entitled "Costa Rica external debt." (Page 4.)
3. From the South American Journal, London, June 3, 1905. City office article headed "The Costa Rica debt." (Page 604.) Further article headed "Costa Rica debt." (Page 605.)

Tabular statement of amount (which is in pounds sterling) of the debt; prices during 1904, highest and lowest; name of bonds, latest quotations therefor. (Page 624.)

4. From the Thirty-second Annual Report of the Council of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders for the years 1904–5, issued October, 1905. London.

I think it is very important, Mr. President, that the attitude assumed by the great financial powers of Europe in respect of our obligations already assumed, or pretended on their part that we have assumed, for the guarantee of the debts of these smaller American Republics, should be known to the Senate, because in our action here upon anything that occurs of a financial character relating to any of these Republics we must be governed in a large degree by what these financial authorities assert are our obligations, as we must either accept them or we must refuse to accept them.

My opinion is that the time has arrived when it is necessary for the Government of the United States to take a definite stand on that subject and not to permit any foreign government, such as Costa Rica, by its negotiations, by the stipulation of its financial arrangements with bondholders of London, to fix a liability upon the United States for the redemption of their debt. Of course it is a presumptuous act, an outrageous thing to do, but it is done by Costa Rica, for instance, in recent negotiation, and these men accept it abroad and their highest financial authorities quote these acts as if they were obligatory upon the United States.

Now, what I want to do, and all I want to do, is to get this information from these sources before the Senate. It has required a good deal of work on my part to get these things from the highest official financial sources in Europe. I think the Senate will find that it is of very great advantage to have these papers printed.

It is nothing to me; I care nothing about it personally at all; but I have felt it was my duty, being a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, to bring this subject to the attention of the Senate. The print, when made, will not be long. It will be a short print. Perhaps it will cover three or four pages of the document, and altogether, perhaps will not cover more than three columns in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. I have just come into the Senate Chamber. Will the Senator kindly indicate just what these papers are? I have no doubt he has already stated it.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read the list I have here.

1. Extract from the Times, London, June 2, 1905. Money market article (p. 13).
2. From the Financial News, London, June 3, 1905. Editorial entitled "Costa Rica external debt" (p. 4).
3. From the South American Journal, London, June 3, 1905. City office article headed "The Costa Rica debt" (p. 604). Further article headed "Costa Rica debt" (p. 605).

Tabular statement of amount (which is in pounds sterling) of the debt; prices during 1904, highest and lowest; name of bonds, latest quotations therefor (p. 624).

4. From the Thirty-second Annual Report of the Council of the Corporation of Foreign Bondholders for the years 1904–5, issued October, 1905. London.

Mr. SPOONER. That is only for information?

Mr. MORGAN. Entirely for information.

I ask, Mr. President, that the papers I have referred to may be printed in the RECORD and also as a document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The papers referred to are as follows:

[Extract from the Times, London, June 2, 1905.]

THE MONEY MARKET.

The council of foreign bondholders communicate the summary of an agreement made between the Government of Costa Rica and Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York, with reference to the settlement of the debt of the Republic. The proposals were considered by the committee of Costa Rica bondholders at a meeting held to-day, and the committee unanimously resolved to recommend their acceptance by a public meeting of the bondholders, to be convened as soon as the agreement has been ratified by the Costa Rican Congress. The agreement is remarkable for the fact that the United States makes itself responsible for fulfillment of the terms. The following are extracts from the summary:

"The Republic will create and issue its 5 per cent refunding bonds for $11,500,000 (United States gold), dated July 1, 1905, and carrying interest from that date. The loan may be increased to $13,239,000 for the purpose of exchange for the outstanding 6 per cent Pacific Railway gold bonds for $1,449,000.

"The bonds are exempt from all taxes, and will be repayable on July 1, 1955, or previously, by the operation of a cumulative sinking fund of at least 1 per cent of the nominal amount of the loan, to be payable as from January, 1910, by monthly installments.

"The loan will be secured by a first charge on all customs receivable by the Republic, whether imposed on imports or exports, and also secured, if the customs receipts prove insufficient to meet the necessary monthly payments for interest, sinking fund, and expenses, and if such deficiency be not paid by the Republic, by a first charge, subject only to the charge in respect of the $1,449,000 Pacific Railway bonds, on the amounts receivable by the Republic on the sale of liquors.

"Holders of the refunding bonds and Messrs. Speyer & Co. shall be entitled to apply to the United States of America for protection against any violation of and for aid in the enforcement of the agreement and the refunding bonds.

"Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Speyer & Co. whereby the latter will act in the conversion of the series A bonds and series B bonds of the present exterior debt of the Republic, and whereby provision will be made for the retirement for cash of the certificates in respect of arrears of interest on such bonds from January 1, 1895, to January 1, 1897, on the basis of the agreement of 1897, and for payment in cash of the interest accruing from April 1, 1901, to July 1, 1905, on the same basis on such bonds as shall be tendered for conversion.

"The holders of both the A and B bonds will upon conversion be entitled, in addition to payment in cash of the arrears of interest, to receive such a nominal amount of the 5 per cent new bonds as will produce an income equivalent to that payable in respect of the A and B bonds under the arrangement of 1897."

COSTA RICA EXTERNAL DEBT.

One of the most striking features in recent stock exchange business has been the upward movement in the market valuations of the bonds of defaulting South and Central American States. In particular, Costa Rica "A" and "B" bonds rose in the past account 11½ and 8½, respectively, and since the commencement of the current year the quotations of both have considerably more than doubled. The appreciation is now to a large extent accounted for by the agreement which has been made between the Government of Costa Rica and Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York (of which we published a summary in our issue of yesterday), subject to ratification by the Congress of the Republic, on the one hand, and acceptance by the external bondholders, on the other hand. After the experience of the unfortunate holders of city of Cordoba bonds, it would not be absolutely safe to count upon the congressional ratification; but, so far as it is possible to judge, there will be neither difficulty nor undue delay upon that score; while the external bondholders are likely the more readily to adopt the recommendation of the council of foreign bondholders since the agreement has in it two highly important clauses, making for something like finality in the settlement.

The clauses we refer to are as follows:

"If the amounts received from customs are at any time insufficient and default is made by the Republic either in payment or otherwise, then, upon the request of either party to the agreement or of the President of the United States of America the Republic is to forthwith submit the matter for arbitration to The Hague tribunal or, in case that tribunal should cease to exist or decline to act, or the Republic and the United States President should so agree, the matter can, on request of such President, be submitted to three arbitrators to be appointed by them as provided in the agreement."

The phraseology of the clause is a little vague, but that of the next one is quite explicit:

"It is also provided that the holders of the refunding bonds and Messrs. Speyer & Co. shall be entitled to apply to the United States of America for protection against any violation of, and for aid in the enforcement of the agreement and the refunding bonds."

It is obvious that these clauses would not have been inserted in the agreement without the sanction of the United States Government, and that, in accordance with the latest interpretation of the Monroe doctrine, that Government will only protect Costa Rica from foreign pressure so long as she fulfills her engagements with her creditors. The agreement thus marks a new departure which may have highly important results for defaulting Spanish-American States and for their creditors.

In the past the treatment which Costa Rica has meted out to her external creditors has been, of course, utterly discreditable and flagrantly dishonest; but in that respect she has been no worse, but rather better, than the majority of the Spanish-American republics. For practical purposes, as Lord Avebury reminded the bondholders in January last year, the public debt of Costa Rica had its origin in 1871–72, when two loans were issued, one for £1,000,000, with interest at 6 per cent and 2 per cent sinking fund, placed by Messrs. Bischoffsheim & Goldschmidt, and the other for £2,400,000, bearing 7 per cent interest and 1 per cent sinking fund, for which Messrs. Knowles & Foster were sponsors. The first loan was issued in moieties at 72 per cent and 74 per cent, respectively, and it is probable that Costa Rica got a much smaller percentage of the second loan, judging from the curious evidence given before the foreign loans commission some thirty years ago; but that was a matter between the Government and its agents—the bondholders were in no way responsible for any diversion of the proceeds of the loans from their proper purpose. In 1874 default took place, and for eleven weary years the bondholders received nothing; and in 1885 they made the most liberal concession to Costa Rica, on the principle that half a loaf would be better than no bread. The principal of the debt outstanding was reduced by 50 per cent, to £2,000,000, divided into £525,000 of A bonds and £1,475,000 of B bonds, the interest being permanently cut down to 5 per cent instead of 6 per cent and 7 per cent, while for each £100 of interest in arrears the bondholders accepted £22 10s. in shares of the Costa Rica Railway Company. The rate of amortization was lowered to 1 per cent.

As some compensation for these reductions, the bondholders were given the special security of "customs notes," which the Government undertook to issue each year up to the sum required to provide for the debt service, the "notes" being preferentially acceptable in payment of customs duties. It was also provided that the old bonds should be retained as collateral security until July 1, 1904. For eight years in succession the 1885 agreement was observed; but no sooner had the old bonds been handed over to the Government than default again took place, and, concurrently, the Government discontinued the issue of the "customs notes."

Two years later, in 1897, a fresh arrangement was sanctioned, under which the interest on the A and B bonds was reduced from 5 per cent to 3 per cent in the former case and 2½ per cent in the latter; the sinking fund was suspended for twenty years, and the coupons in arrear, amounting to £250,000, were funded into noninterest-bearing certificates for £100,000, redeemable in twenty years by a sinking fund of £5,000 per annum. The debt payments were to be (but, in point of fact, never were) paid in monthly installments, and in the event of default for six consecutive months the rights of the bondholders under the 1885 agreement were to be ipso facto revived. The latest default has continued since October, 1891, despite every effort on the part of the council of foreign bondholders and its representatives to induce the Government of Costa Rica to act honestly toward the bondholders. Under all the circumstances, those bondholders would be perfectly justified in insisting that the arrangement of 1885 should be reverted to; but to do so would be to prolong the default for a quite indefinite period, and, upon careful consideration, we are confident that they will accept the terms of settlement proposed. The total indebtedness of the Republic, funded and unfunded, amounts to $15,284,000, while the new issue is to be 5 per cent refunding United States gold bonds for $11,500,000; but it may be increased to $13,239,000 for the purpose of exchange for the outstanding 6 per cent Pacific Railway gold bonds for $11,449,000.

Principal and interest is to be payable in New York, or, at the holder's option, at a fixed rate of exchange of $4.85 per £1, in London. The sinking fund has been fixed at 1 per cent (at least), payable in monthly installments, and to be applied by Messrs. Speyer & Co., in the purchase of bonds, at not exceeding par and interest, or by drawings at par and interest. The loan is to be secured by a first charge on all customs receivable by the Republic, whether on imports or exports, any deficiency being made good by the amounts receivable on the sale of liquors. The customs revenue has risen steadily from $1,238,000 in 1900 to $1,676,000 last year, while the liquor revenues have fallen in the same period from $424,000 to $335,000, after being as low as $301,000 in 1903. There is ample security for the loan if the Government chooses to act honorably, and, as the holders of the A and B bonds are to be entitled, in addition to payment in cash of the arrears of interest, to receive such a nominal amount of the new 5 per cent bonds as will produce an income equivalent to that payable under the 1897 arrangement, they have reason to feel very grateful alike to the council of foreign bondholders and to Messrs. Speyer & Co. for bringing about a welcome, if tardy, termination of what threatened to be a permanent default.

THE COSTA RICA DEBT.

Fluctuating between 29 as highest and 17½ as the lowest, and opening this year at 28, Costa Rica A bonds have this week advanced to 58½, much of this improvement having taken place quite recently. Undoubtedly the current quotation is a record one, and has, I understand, been brought about by heavy purchases on behalf of Messrs. Speyer in connection with the funding arrangement announced yesterday. Costa Rica has been in default so long that bondholders are to be congratulated on a deal which gives such a high value to their bonds, for which they are greatly indebted to Messrs. Speyer. Of course, this great American firm are not philanthropists, and it is believed that behind them they have, at least, the moral support of the United States Government. Several clauses in the agreement would seem to point to this, for it would appear that the new loan is to be specially secured upon the Republic's customs receipts, which are to be collected through a customs agency to be designated by Messrs. Speyer, but should default take place then designations may be made by the President of the United States, who, in another clause, also has the right to request Costa Rica to submit any disputes or questions arising to arbitration. The holders of Costa Rica B bonds will get £50 of the new 5 per cent funding bonds, plus arrears of interest in cash, which should justify even a better price than that now ruling. They are expected to command a price of fully 80, and in some quarters par is looked for. It is believed that Messrs. Speyer have other Central American defaulting states in hand. (City office.)

The council of foreign bondholders communicate the summary of an agreement made between the Government of Costa Rica and Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York, with reference to the settlement of the debt of the Republic. The proposals were considered by the committee of Costa Rica bondholders at a meeting held on Thursday, and the committee unanimously resolved to recommend their acceptance by a public meeting of the bondholders to be convened as soon as the agreement has been ratified by the Costa Rican Congress.

The following is a summary, in United States gold, of the indebtedness of the Republic:

(a) Bonded debt (outstanding April 1, 1905):
1. Exterior debt		$11,690,925.00
2. Interior debt		693,315.00
3. Pacific Railway bonds		1,449,000.00
(b) Unfunded debt (outstanding January 1, 1905):
1. Floating debt	$991,928.24
2. Consolidated debt	458,382.44
		1,450,310.68
		15,283,550.68

The Republic will create and issue its 5 per cent refunding United States gold bonds for $11,500,000 in denominations of $1,000 and $500, payable to bearer, and dated July 1, 1905, and carrying interest from such date. The loan may be increased to $13,239,000 for the purpose of exchange for the outstanding 6 per cent Pacific Railway gold bonds for $1,449,000.

Principal and interest of refunding bonds payable at Messrs. Speyer & Co., New York, or, at the holders' option, at a fixed rate of exchange of $4.85 per £1, in London, at Messrs. Speyer Brothers, and at 2.50 guilders per dollar in Amsterdam, at Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Brothers.

The bonds are exempt from all taxes, and will be repayable on July 1, 1955, or previously, by the operation of a cumulative sinking fund of at least 1 per cent of the nominal amount of the loan, to be payable as from January, 1910, by monthly installments, and to be applied by Messrs. Speyer & Co. in the purchase of bonds at not exceeding par and interest, or by drawings at par and interest, thirty days' notice at least of the drawings to be given. The Republic reserves the right to at any time pay any further sums to the credit of the sinking fund.

The loan constitutes a direct obligation of the Republic, and will be secured by a first charge on all customs receivable by the Republic, whether imposed on imports or exports, and also secured (if the customs receipts prove insufficient to meet the necessary monthly payments for interest, sinking fund and expenses, and if such deficiency be not paid by the Republic) by a first charge (subject only to the charge in respect of the $1,449,000 Pacific Railway bonds) on the amounts receivable by the Republic on the sale of liquors.

A customs agency (to be designated by Messrs. Speyer & Co. until default shall have been made by the Republic, when the designation may be made by the President of the United States of America, and, failing him, by Messrs. Speyer & Co.) is to be established, and is to have the sole right to issue (1) certificates with which all customs upon imports and exports receivable by the Republic are alone to be paid, and (2) (if the proceeds of the issue of the above certificates shall in any month be insufficient, and such deficiency shall not be met by the Republic) certificates in which alone the purchase price of all liquor sold by the Republic shall be payable.

The agency is monthly to remit to Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York (who are to act as agents and bankers of the Republic in America, Great Britain, and the continent of Europe), for the service of the loan, one-twelfth of the amount necessary to provide for interest, sinking fund, and expenses.

The Republic is under obligation so long as any of the bonds remain outstanding not to create any further charge or hypothecation in priority or to ranking pari passu with the bonds, and also not (without the assent of Messrs. Speyer & Co., after notice to them) to vary or change the customs on exports or imports, or assign, pledge, or otherwise deal with the right of manufacture of liquor.

If the amounts received from customs is at any time insufficient, and default is made by the Republic, either in payment or otherwise, then, upon the request of either party to the agreement, or of the President of the United States of America, the Republic is to forthwith submit the matter for arbitration to The Hague Tribunal, or in case that tribunal should cease to exist or decline to act, or the Republic and the United States President should so agree, the matter can, on request of such President, be submitted to three arbitrators, to be appointed by them as provided in the agreement.

It is also provided that the holders of the refunding bonds and Messrs. Speyer & Co. shall be entitled to apply to the United States of America for protection against any violation of and for aid in the enforcement of the agreement and the refunding bonds.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Speyer & Co. whereby the latter will act in the conversion of the series A bonds and series B bonds of the present exterior debt of the Republic, and whereby provision will be made for the retirement for cash of the certificates in respect of arrears of interest on such bonds from January 1, 1895, to January 1, 1897, on the basis of the agreement of 1897, and for payment in cash of the interest accruing from April 1, 1901, to July 1, 1905, on the same basis on such bonds as shall be tendered for conversion.

The holders of both the A and B bonds will upon conversion be entitled, in addition to payment in cash of the arrears of interest, to receive such a nominal amount of the 5 per cent new bonds as will produce an income equivalent to that payable in respect of the A and B bonds under the arrangement of 1897.

The Republic is to primarily apply any balance of the proceeds of the bonds received by it to the payment off of the floating and consolidated debts of the country.

(Page 10.)

At the time of the publication of the last report there were six Spanish-American debts in default, viz, those of Colombia, Costa Rica, Guatemala, Honduras, and Venezuela, and the Buenos Ayres Cedulas. It is satisfactory to state that two of these debts, the Colombian and Venezuelan, have been settled on terms which, all things considered, may be regarded as fair, especially in the case of the former. Negotiations are proceeding for a settlement of the Costa Rica debt and of the Buenos Ayres Cedulas, and it is to be hoped that arrangements may be effected in both cases in the near future.

Although rumors have been afloat that the two worst of the defaulting States—Honduras and Guatemala—are about to make proposals to their creditors, no offer has been submitted by either of them to the council. It is certain, however, that sooner or later these defaulting countries will realize that the absence of all credit, and the fact that the money markets of the world are closed to them, outweigh any sacrifices they might have to make in order to pay their obligations to the bondholders.

The past year has witnessed a very remarkable appreciation in the market value of Spanish-American securities. The following table, showing the comparative prices of the bonds of eight of these countries at the end of September of each year from 1901 to 1905, inclusive, is of interest:

	1901.	1902.	1903.	1904.	1905.
Colombia	14	18	24½	24	44
Costa Rica A	16½	24	22	26	56
Costa Rica B	15	19	19	19½	46
Guatemala	13	27½	21	24	39½
Honduras	5	5½	5½	6	13
Nicaragua	57½	66½	60½	59	79
Paraguay	23	27	29	35	50
Uruguay	49½	55½	58½	59½	72
Venezuela	26	29	32½	42	51

The appreciation in value between 1901 and 1905 has been approximately as follows:

	Per cent.
Colombia	215
Costa Rica (average)	223
Guatemala	200
Honduras	160
Nicaragua	37
Paraguay	120
Uruguay	45
Venezuela	97

It is understood that the increase in values is largely due to the idea that the recent utterances of President Roosevelt with regard to the Monroe doctrine were intended to indicate that the United States Government would not allow the Spanish-American Republics to take advantage of the protection afforded them by the United States in order to evade the payment of their liabilities to their foreign creditors, and that if they did not, in the President's words, "act with decency in industrial and political matters, keep order, and pay their obligations," the United States would take steps to compel them to do so. It is sincerely to be hoped that this may prove to be the case. The attitude of the United States Government in connection with Panama, Santo Domingo, and Guatemala, which is dealt with in the appendix of this report, can not, however, be regarded as affording the English bondholders much cause for congratulation.

(Pages 16 and 17.)

Costa Rica.—In June last Messrs. Speyer Brothers informed the council that a provisional agreement, which included the settlement of the external debt, had been arrived at between their New York house and the Government of Costa Rica. The agreement provided for the issue of a new debt of $11,500,000 United States gold, bearing interest at 5 per cent, and with a sinking fund of 1 per cent to commence in 1910, which was to be applied to the conversion of the existing external debt and of a portion of the internal debt, and to the payment in cash of all the arrears of interest on the external debt and of stamp duties, etc., in connection with the new issue. The holders of A and B bonds were to receive 60 per cent and 50 per cent, respectively, in new bonds on account of their capital, besides the cash payment for arrears, amounting in the case of A bonds to £12 15s. and in that of B bonds to £10 12s. 6d. The new loan was to be secured by a first charge on the customs receipts and collaterally by a second charge on the receipts on the liquor revenue. A customs agency, charged with the issue of certificates by means of which all duties were to be paid, was to be established and designated by Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York, and the agreement contained a provision that in the event of a default taking place, this agency might be designated by the President of the United States.

The proposals were considered by the committee, who resolved that they would be prepared to recommend them to the acceptance of the bondholders, provided that they were first ratified by the Costa Rican Congress. Unexpected difficulties have, however, arisen, and as far as the council have been able to ascertain, no decision has been arrived at by Congress. It is understood that a new government will shortly come into office, and that no further progress can be made until Congress reassembles in the spring of next year.

REPORT.

The service of the external debt of Costa Rica has remained in total default during the past year.

Although the Government of Costa Rica has several times intimated to the council that they would shortly submit an offer of settlement, no such offer was forthcoming, but in June last the council were informed by Messrs. Speyer Brothers that an ad referendum agreement had been entered into by the Government with their New York house. The following epitome of the agreement was handed to the council by Messrs. Speyer Brothers:

The Republic of Costa Rica. Epitome of agreement dated 18th of May, 1905, made between the Republic of Costa Rica and Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York, bankers.

OBJECT OF AGREEMENT.

The agreement (which is subject to ratification by the Congress of the Republic, and if not duly ratified before the 1st July, 1905, and a duplicate filed within 30 days after ratification with the Department of State of the United States of America, can be determined by the bankers) has for its object the readjustment of the external debt of the Republic by the issue of refunding bonds.

The following is a summary, in U. S. A. gold, of the indebtedness of the Republic as set out in schedule "A" to the agreement:

PRESENT INDEBTEDNESS OF THE REPUBLIC.

(a) Bonded debt (outstanding April 1st, 1905):
1. Exterior debt		$11,690,925.00
2. Interior debt		963,315.00
3. Pacific Railway bonds		1,449,000.00
(b) Unfunded debt (outstanding January 1st, 1905):
1. Floating debt	$991,928.24
2. Consolidated debt	458,382.44
		1,450,310.68
		15,283,550.68

And the following is a summary (in United States of America gold taken at 46½ cents per colon) of the statement contained in Schedule "B" of the agreement of gross customs receipts, including receipts from customs on imports of liquor for the year 1900 to 1904, viz:

1900	$1,238,452.44
1901	1,301,640.49
1902	1,319,888.26
1903	1,648,000.97
1904	1,675,527.43

And also of the statement in such schedule of the net revenues from sales of liquor taken at 46½ cents per colon for the same years, viz:

1900	$424,063.26
1901	365,049.18
1902	317,585.70
1903	301,203.19
1904	334,800.00

AMOUNT OF NEW REFUNDING LOAN.

The Republic will create and issue its 5 per cent refunding United States gold bonds for $11,500,000 in denominations of $1,000 and $500, payable to bearer, and dated July 1, 1905, and carrying interest from such date. The loan may be increased to $13,239,000 for the purpose of exchange for the outstanding 6 per cent Pacific Railway gold bonds for $1,449,000.

Principal and interest of refunding bonds payable at Messrs. Speyer & Co., New York, or, at the holders' option, at a fixed rate of exchange of $4.85 per £1 sterling in London, at Messrs. Speyer Brothers, or at 2.5 guilders per dollar in Amsterdam, at Messrs. Teixeira de Mattos Brothers.

AMORTIZATION OF BONDS.

The bonds are exempt from all taxes and will be repayable on the 1st of July, 1955, or previously, by operation of a cumulative sinking fund of at least 1 per cent of the nominal amount of the loan to be payable as from January, 1910, by monthly installments, and to be applied by Messrs. Speyer & Co. in the purchase of bonds at not exceeding par and interest, or by drawings at par and interest, thirty days' notice at least of the drawings to be given. The Republic reserves the right to at any time pay any further sums to the credit of the sinking fund.

SECURITY FOR THE LOAN.

The loan constitutes a direct obligation of the Republic, and will be secured by a first charge on all customs receivable by the Republic, whether imposed on imports or exports, and also secured (if the customs receipts prove insufficient to meet the necessary monthly payments of interest, sinking fund, and expenses, and if such deficiency be not paid by the Republic) by a first charge (subject only to the charge in respect of the $1,449,000 Pacific Railway bonds) on the amounts receivable by the Republic on the sale of liquors.

COLLECTION OF CUSTOMS.

A customs agency (to be designated by Messrs. Speyer & Co. until default shall have been made by the Republic, when the designation may be made by the President of the United States of America, and failing him, by Messrs. Speyer & Co.) is to be established, and is to have the sole right to issue (1) certificates with which all customs upon imports and exports receivable by the Republic are alone to be paid, and (2) (if the proceeds of the issue of the above certificates shall in any month be insufficient, and such deficiency shall not be met by the Republic) certificates in which alone the purchase price of all liquor sold by the Republic shall be payable.

REMITTANCES BY AGENCY FOR SERVICE OF LOAN.

The agency is monthly to remit to Messrs. Speyer & Co., of New York (who are to act as agents and bankers of the Republic in America, Great Britain, and the Continent of Europe), for the service of the loan, one-twelfth of the amount necessary to provide for interest, sinking fund, and expenses.

REPUBLIC NOT TO VARY CUSTOMS, ETC., WITHOUT ASSENT.

The Republic is under obligation so long as any of the bonds remain outstanding not to create any further charge or hypothecation in priority to or ranking pari passu with the bonds, and also not (without the assent of Messrs. Speyer & Co., after notice to them) to vary or change the customs or exports or imports, or assign pledge or otherwise deal with the right of manufacture of liquor.

ARBITRATION IN CASE OF DEFAULT ON PART OF REPUBLIC.

If the amount received from customs is at any time insufficient, and default in made by the Republic either in payment or otherwise, then, upon the request of either party to the agreement or of the President of the United States of America, the Republic is to forthwith submit the matter for arbitration to The Hague Tribunal, or, in case that tribunal should cease to exist or decline to act, or the Republic and the United States President should so agree, the matter can, on request of such President, be submitted to three arbitrators to be appointed by them as provided in the agreement.

It is also provided that the holders of the refunding bonds and Messrs. Speyer & Co. shall be entitled to apply to the United States of America for protection against any violation of and for aid in the enforcement of the agreement and the refunding bonds.

CONVERSION OF EXISTING A AND B BONDS.

Arrangements have been made with Messrs. Speyer & Co whereby the latter will act in the conversion of the series A bonds and series B bonds of the present exterior debt of the Republic, and whereby provision will be made for the retirement for cash of the certificates in respect of arrears of interest on such bonds from January 1, 1895, to January 1, 1897, on the basis of the agreement of 1897, and for the payment in cash of the interest accruing from April 1, 1901, to July 1, 1905, on the same basis on such bonds as shall be tendered for conversion.

The holders of both A and B bonds will upon conversion be entitled, in addition to payment in cash of the arrears of interest, to receive such a nominal amount of the 5 per cent new bonds as will produce an income equivalent to that payable in respect of the A and B bonds under the arrangement of 1897.

The Republic is to primarily apply any balance of the proceeds of the bonds received by it to the paying off of the floating and consolidated debt of the country.

Dated June 1, 1905.

The committee, having considered the terms as above proposed for the settlement of the external debt, resolved that, provided the agreement was ratified by the Costa Rican Congress, they would recommend the proposals to the acceptance of the bondholders.

Messrs. Speyer Brothers were hopeful that the agreement would have been ratified by Congress before the end of June, but unexpected difficulties and delays arose, and, as far as the council have been able to ascertain, the further consideration of the matter has been postponed until after the elections, which are to take place toward the close of the present year.

Judging from the account given by the President and the finance minister of the financial condition of the country and the large sum expended on the payment of internal obligations, the conduct of the Costa Rican Government in allowing the external debt to remain for so long a period in total default is deserving of the strongest condemnation.

E. G. RATHBONE.

Mr. DICK. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the petitions in the case of E. G. Rathbone, and all the accompanying papers, including Senate Document No. 367, now in the files of the Secretary of the Senate, be temporarily withdrawn from said files, and 500 copies of the same be printed as a document for the use of the Senate.

Mr. HOPKINS. Ought not those matters to be looked into a little before they are printed as a document?

Mr. DICK. The matter has been looked into by the committee of which the Senator from Illinois is a member. They are in the files of the Senate, and the request is in part following a resolution by the Ohio legislature asking that this matter be inquired into. I hope the Senator from Illinois will not insist upon an objection to so fair and reasonable a request.

Mr. WARREN. My attention was distracted in another direction. I will ask the Senator what the proposition is.

Mr. DICK. The proposition is to print 500 copies of the petition and papers in the case of E. G. Rathbone, a matter in which the files are very complete but which have never been printed. These are for the use and information of Senators during the recess, since it is now too late in this session to take the matter up by the committee to which it was referred.

Mr. WARREN. Is it anything that has been presented to a committee of the Senate heretofore?

Mr. DICK. How does the Senator mean?

Mr. WARREN. Has the subject-matter been before any one of the committees of the Senate?

Mr. DICK. Not in this Congress.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator, I recall that in the Committee on Military Affairs a full hearing was had on a subject which brought up the so-called "Rathbone matter." Major Rathbone was present and the report of the hearing then had was printed. I think before that the matter in part or as a whole had been considered by the Committee on Cuban Relations. Perhaps the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM], the chairman of that committee, can tell us something about it.

Mr. DICK. The matter at the present time by proper reference is with the Committee on Cuban Relations, and not with the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator then refers to what was before the Committee on Cuban Relations.

Mr. DICK. I am not familiar with what was before the Committee on Military Affairs. At the present time this whole matter is with the Committee on Cuban Relations.

Mr. WARREN. I will ask the Senator if it will suit his purpose as well to let the resolution lie over a day until the chairman of the Committee on Cuban Relations can look at it, also the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. DICK. I will say in response that the chairman of the Committee on Cuban Relations is entirely familiar with the matter, and with my request. He offers no objection to it.

Mr. WARREN. I should be glad to look at it, if there is no objection, and it will come up in the morning hour at our next session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the resolution will go over.

SUITS UNDER ANTITRUST LAW AND INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. LONG. I offer a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of all suits instituted by the Department of Justice under the Sherman antitrust law and the interstate-commerce law, and the disposition made of such suits.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask the Senator from Kansas from what time does he propose to call for this information?

Mr. LONG. I did not understand the Senator's inquiry?

Mr. CULBERSON. The resolution proposes that the Attorney-General shall be directed to send to the Senate information as to suits instituted under the Sherman law. From what time shall he begin to state the suits?

Mr. LONG. All suits.

Mr. CULBERSON. By every Attorney-General since the act?

Mr. LONG. Certainly. A part of this information is in a certain document, and the purpose is to complete that statement.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let the resolution be read again.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. Upon reflection, I am inclined to think that it is the proper construction of the resolution that it covers all suits instituted by the Department of Justice under the acts.

Mr. LONG. Certainly; that is the purpose of it.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Kansas has offered the resolution, but I want to offer an amendment to it. I will state it:

Also a separate statement of suits brought under the so-called "Elkins law," giving date when suits were brought, character of the suits, and the final disposition of the same.

Mr. LONG. That will be included.

Mr. FORAKER. It might be included under the reference to the interstate-commerce act, but I want to have it included particularly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the resolution the following:

And also suits brought under the so-called "Elkins law," including their character, dates, and final disposition.

Mr. FORAKER. "When brought, the character, and final disposition."

Now, Mr. President, before that is agreed to, while it is before the Senate, I wish to make a few remarks upon it.

I want that information because I think it will show, when it is brought to the attention of Senators, what I have been contending for here without very much success for the last five or six months, that we have got all the law now on the statute books, or would have if amended as I proposed, if it be only properly enforced, that is necessary to correct every evil that anybody has made complaint of in this Chamber since the rate bill discussion commenced.

I wish in this connection to call attention to the fact that under the Elkins law there was first the Wichita case, as it was called, reported in 189 United States, where the Supreme Court of the United States held that under the Elkins law a community could maintain a suit against a railroad for an injunction to enjoin a discrimination against it in the making of rates for it and other communities with which it may be in competition for markets.

Then that was followed by the Fairmount coal case. I do not want to be tedious about this, and I will therefore indicate just enough to show the character of these cases. That was a West Virginia case, a suit in mandamus, where the complaint was that a mine operator was being discriminated against in the allotment of cars. A mandamus was allowed and the proceeding was sustained. The court made a finding of what his proper allotment of cars was and made an order in accordance with it. The case went to the circuit court of appeals, and there, with the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States presiding, that decision of the circuit court was affirmed.

So in those two cases you have, first, the fact established that you can maintain an injunction suit to protect a locality from discrimination; and, in the second place, that you have a legal remedy, a prompt, efficient one, that you can avail yourself of at any moment when you can go to the court-house with the proper pleading and file it to protect you against discrimination in the allotment of cars.

Then that was followed by the Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven coal case, as it is termed. That was the case in which it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that rebates could not be given under the guise of fixing a price for a commodity which the railroad company itself was assuming the right to sell and make delivery of; that under the provision of the Elkins law which prohibits discrimination by any device whatever that kind of a practice was prohibited.

Then came the Pabst Brewery case, decided only a few weeks ago at Milwaukee, where it was held that private car lines, refrigerator cars, icing charges, brokers' commissions, and all such devices as those were prohibited by the Elkins law, and that upon the filing of a bill of complaint the court would immediately, if the bill stated a case, allow a temporary restraining order, as they did in that case, which could be made final, as it was in that case a few months later when the case was fully heard.

And now come the last cases, which were decided a few days ago at Kansas City, the cases of the C., B. and Q., where it was charged that the shippers and the railroads were violating the interstate-commerce law and were liable under the Elkins law to an injunction to restrain them, and that they were guilty of a conspiracy, for which they have been convicted and sentenced only yesterday, as shown by to-day's newspapers.

That was a very interesting case, and I want to call attention to it and have it go into the RECORD, so that Senators may see how completely—as completely as the glove fits the hand—the Elkins law fits every one of these cases. In the C., B. and Q. cases at Kansas City, Senators will remember, an agreement was entered into between the railroad and the shippers by which a certain rate of freight was to be paid. This rate and the published rate at the date of the contract were the same. Later, after that agreement had gone into effect, the railroad saw fit to increase its published rate, so that the contract rate and the published rate after that increase differed; to allow the contract rate was therefore to allow a concession below the published rate. The court held that the contract was no defense, but only a device, and that these shippers were guilty of getting and the railroad of granting a rebate or an unlawful concession, or whatever it may be thought fit to call it, and that it was in violation of the Elkins law, which prohibits any such advantage by any device whatever. It was also found upon the trial of the shippers and the brokers who made that arrangement that they were guilty criminally under the conspiracy act, and yesterday the shippers and the railroad were each fined $15,000 under the Elkins law, and two of the defendants—the brokers who negotiated the arrangement—were fined heavily, one being fined $6,000 and the other being fined $4,000; and in addition one was sentenced to four months in the penitentiary and the other to three months in the penitentiary.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Could there have been a conspiracy to violate the laws of the United States without all of those people being guilty? I think the Senator will agree that there could not. What I have not been able to understand from reading the account in the morning paper is that some of them seem to have been punished criminally and others were not.

Mr. FORAKER. Well, Mr. President, I have not a full account of the case. I am familiar only with that which appears in the newspapers, and I observed what the Senator from Texas has called attention to; but the fact remains that all who were punished were found guilty of violating the Elkins law, and that the shippers and the railroads were all alike fined each in the sum of $15,000, and that, too, under the Elkins law.

If anybody has escaped, it was not the fault of the law.

Mr. BAILEY. And that will give the country great satisfaction. Now, if they will follow that by putting every man who violated the Elkins law into prison for conspiracy to violate it, they will have done very much to vindicate the authority of the Government.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, indeed, Mr. President; and that is precisely what I have been calling attention to for the last five or six months. I have been saying that the Elkins law prohibits every discrimination, no matter what the character of it may be, no matter whether it be against a locality or against an individual; and that it prohibits not only every discrimination, but it also prohibits every kind of rebate; and I have been contending that the only legislation that we needed to enact was legislation that would broaden and strengthen the Elkins law, so as to make it more available and more effective than it already is. I have been contending that all that was necessary was that the Department of Justice should enforce that law, as they are now doing day by day, and as they have enforced it in the cases which I have just cited.

In the Washington Post of this morning we have in the first column the following headlines—I am not going to read the article, but only the headlines to indicate the character of what follows:

WAR ON STANDARD BEGUN BY MOODY—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS OF OIL-TRUST OFFICERS UNDER THE ELKINS ACT—JAIL SENTENCES WILL BE SOUGHT IF CONVICTION RESULTS—MORE PROBING ORDERED—ATTORNEY-GENERAL SUGGESTS CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS AGAINST OFFICIALS AND EMPLOYEES OF THE STANDARD OIL COMPANY FOR ALLEGED VIOLATIONS OF LAWS REGULATING INTERSTATE COMMERCE AND PROHIBITING REBATES AND OTHER UNLAWFUL DISCRIMINATIONS—SPECIAL INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS OF THE "OCTOPUS" TO BE CONDUCTED BY SPECIAL COUNSEL.

That is in the first column of the first page; we have also, in the last column on the same page of to-day's Washington Post, the following headlines:

BOTH FINE AND JAIL—SENTENCE PRONOUNCED IN RAILROAD REBATE CASES—DEFENDANTS MAKE APPEAL—COURT MENTIONS OTHERS AS SUBJECT TO INDICTMENT.

What is meant by that part of the headline "others subject to indictment" is this: The court, in rendering its decision, announced that not only those who were before the court and who had been shown to have been guilty of violating the law were liable to the fines and to the punishment that it was imposing, but still others, according to the testimony which had been introduced, were equally liable, and that it was the duty of the officers of the law to indict all of those others. He was proceeding upon the assumption that they all would be indicted. Now, what I want to bring to the attention of the Senate is that to strengthen that law as I proposed is a very simple proposition. It is something that involves no constitutional question; something that does not involve the conferring of new power upon the Commission; something that involves no experiment; something that conforms to the rules that have governed us in the prohibition of offenses against public policy and in the punishment of offenders. By simply doing that which would injuriously affect nobody we could perfect a law that we are already familiar with, that has already been upheld, so admitted, and with its enforcement all over the country there could not be any doubt about the breaking up of all these evil practices that have been complained of. What I call attention to further is that all this good work is being done under existing law.

This completely vindicates all that has been said in that respect. Therefore it is, Mr. President, that when I read in this morning's paper that the conferees had not reached an agreement upon the railroad rate bill I was not disturbed. I think it would be a great blessing if they should be unable to agree; or, they agreeing, that we would exercise our judgment and condemn it and prohibit it from ever becoming a statute; for a more unnecessary law, or a more mischief-making law was never placed upon the statute book than this will be if we place if there, and it will not take more than twelve months longer for every Senator here to find it out.

Mr. BACON and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas desires to speak to the resolution, I shall yield to him.

Mr. LONG. I will yield to the Senator if he desires to speak.

Mr. BACON. I merely wish to offer an amendment to the resolution. Does the Senator desire to speak to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]? If he does, I will yield that he may do so.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Kansas that he ask that his resolution be laid aside, as it is evidently going to lead to some discussion, and it will be easy to get it up later. It is very important that the agricultural appropriation bill should be sent to conference. We have other business—executive business at 3 o'clock—and it will be very doubtful, if this discussion goes on, if the agricultural bill can be sent to conference to-day. If the Senator will consent to lay the resolution aside, I will then move that the agricultural appropriation bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, of course I am aware that the resolution, having been introduced to-day, is subject to objection. I had no idea that it would lead to discussion, and I have no objection to laying it aside. I therefore ask that it go over until after the disposition of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. I understood I had the floor, although I have not had the advantage of it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator.

Mr. BACON. I only yielded to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not desire to interfere with the purpose of the Senator from Vermont, and will not occupy the time of the Senate further than to offer an amendment to the resolution, and then I shall be perfectly willing that it shall go over, if that be the desire of the Senator who offered the resolution.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the resolution goes over, I desire to say a word.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I desire to say, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope I may have an opportunity to offer the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not intend to object to the amendment being offered, although if the Senator does not permit me to say what I want to say I shall raise the point of order against it. I merely wish to say that after the amendment is reported I shall ask that the whole matter go over.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FORAKER. Before it goes over I want to say a word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the resolution it is proposed to add the following:

The Attorney-General is further directed to report to the Senate what portion of the special appropriation of $500,000 heretofore made to enforce said laws has been disbursed and the manner of such disbursement.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say, in order that my offering of the amendment may not be misconstrued, that it was with no purpose of criticism, but simply that we may have the necessary information to guide us in whatever future appropriation we may find it necessary to make.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I merely want to add a sentence or two to what I said a moment ago; and that is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is now doing the best work it has ever done in all its history in prosecuting as an executive board or commission the work of investigation. That is the kind of work to which such a board is properly adapted—to "take off the lid" and let us see what there is under it. As they have progressed in the investigation of the Pennsylvania Railroad not one thing has been disclosed that the Elkins law does not fit and prohibit and punish if that law be only properly enforced. So, too, it is with the Standard Oil Company. Mr. Garfield made a report recently in which he detailed a great many things of which he made complaint. I do not know what the facts are, for his statements are denied, but assuming that they are all true, the Elkins law would punish that company for all those things, and the law we are about to pass will not reach one of them. I will venture to say, further, that the Elkins law applies to every one of them; and no man here or elsewhere has suggested an offense that the Elkins law does not fit.

Mr. LONG. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia if he desires to discuss the amendment? I have no objection to it.

Mr. BACON. I have no such desire. The statement I desired to make was that I did not offer the amendment in criticism, but simply with a desire to get information.

Mr. LONG. With a slight modification of the amendment presented by the Senator from Ohio, I think the resolution might be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. LONG. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio a modification of his amendment to the resolution. I think the resolution includes what the Senator has offered in his amendment; and I have no objection to it with a slight modification.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It may be better for the Secretary to read the entire resolution as it will read if amended.

The Secrefary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of all suits instituted by the Department of Justice under the Sherman antitrust law and the interstate-commerce law and the disposition made of such suits, including all suits brought under the so-called Elkins law, when brought, character, and final disposition thereof.

The Attorney-General is further directed to report to the Senate what portion of the special appropriation of $500,000 heretofore made to enforce said laws has been disbursed and the manner of such disbursement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, let the resolution go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the resolution goes over.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the agricultural appropriation bill be now laid before the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I rise to claim the floor as a matter of privilege.

Mr. PROCTOR. I can not yield for any other business.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Under this order of business——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill. That is within his right; and the question is on his motion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. One moment, if the Chair will pardon me. Under this order of business, as I understand the rule, it is my right to call up a privileged resolution lying on the table. I have been on my feet here for some time trying to do that.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Vermont is in order. The Senate can either adopt his motion or reject it. It is a matter for the Senate to determine. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. PROCTOR. There is an absolute necessity of considering the matter of referring this bill to a committee of conference immediately, and I regret very much that I can not yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wisconsin desires to call up a resolution which is on the table subject to call in the morning hour, and of course, while the Senate can displace that, that, as I understand, would be the business in order, in the absence of any direct vote of the Senate to the contrary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the right to call up is merely a matter of courtesy, and that a motion would take precedence.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if such a motion is submitted it must be put to a vote, I take it, and the Senate so order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It must be put to a vote. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives and disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 29, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If it becomes necessary for me to do so, I shall take the time in discussing that motion which I would have taken in calling up the resolution. I sought the recognition of the Chair to say to the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that I would yield for the present, because I had been assured by the chairman of the committee that the agricultural appropriation bill would take probably not more than thirty minutes. I sought recognition to say to the chairman of the committee that I would yield any right which I had to claim the floor before 2 o'clock if I might have unanimous consent at 2 o'clock to take up and discuss the resolution lying upon the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That at 2 o'clock the Senate take up and proceed to discuss the resolution lying on the table.

Mr. KEAN. Let the request be modified so that the resolution will be taken up after the conclusion of the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. PROCTOR. I would vote for a motion to take up the resolution to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers immediately after the appropriation bill is sent to conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Ah, Mr. President, but at 3 o'clock there is already a unanimous-consent agreement that we go into executive session.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont if his only purpose is to move a reference of the agricultural appropriation bill to conference?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly. I made the motion several days ago, but there was some debate upon several items in amendment No. 29, and so the bill has not been sent to conference. There is something more—I hope not a great deal—to be said on that matter. No time will be taken by me. I hope the bill will be sent to conference within the hour. I had hoped that it might be disposed of immediately. The motion to send it to conference is pending.

Mr. CULBERSON. I simply rose, Mr. President, thinking that perhaps the motion of the Senator from Vermont might be adopted without further discussion, and that the Senator from Wisconsin could proceed with his resolution. I did not suppose that the motion of the Senator from Vermont would provke further discussion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It will.

Mr. CULBERSON. That is the reason I made the inquiry. If it will provoke discussion, however, of course the suggestion will not hold.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Vermont to move that the Senate insist on its amendments to the bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Chair to submit to the Senate my request for unanimous consent, and I have not understood that any objection had been interposed to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will again submit the request. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I object to the request, and I wish to suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that in making this objection it is not made in the least in any spirit of antagonism to his resolution at all; on the contrary, I want his resolution considered as much as anybody else does. But, Mr. President, I suggest, as a way out of this difficulty, that we agree that as soon as the motion of the Senator from Vermont is considered and concluded and the appropriation bill is sent to conference, the resolution of the Senator from Wisconsin shall be taken up and discussed and disposed of, if possible, by 3 o'clock.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would not, Mr. President, have submitted even a request for unanimous consent this morning, interposing it before the consideration of the motion to send the agricultural appropriation bill to conference, if the resolution which I introduced, and which has been lying on the table, was not nearly, if not quite, as important as the consideration of the matters which provoke debate in the agricultural appropriation bill, as I shall make entirely plain to the Senate when I have the opportunity to submit the evidence in my possession.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GALLINGER. I object to any agreement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If objection is made to that request, I submit this——

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to a point of order. I ask if the motion of the Senator from Vermont is debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that the motion to take up the message of the House requesting a conference is not; but the motion to agree to the conference asked by the House is.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is my opinion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not debating the motion; I am submitting a request for unanimous consent, to which I do not believe any Senator will object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that to the request for unanimous consent an objection was interposed.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understood; but I wish to submit another request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that the only thing before the Senate is the motion made by the Senator from Vermont. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, do I understand the Chair to hold that that motion is not debatable?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; the motion is debatable.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, Mr. President, if it is debatable, I want to occupy the floor for a moment to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], in charge of the bill, to what I believe the courts would hold to be a fatal defect. It authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to have made—

> An examination and inspection of all cattle, sheep, swine, and goats before they shall be allowed to enter into any slaughtering, packing, meat-canning, rendering, or similar establishment in which they are to be slaughtered and the meat and meat food products thereof are to be used in interstate or foreign commerce.

I am deeply anxious to see this Congress enact a law that will restore confidence at home and abroad in the cleanliness of our methods and in the wholesomeness of our meats. Whatever may be said about the origin of this controversy and wherever the blame should be placed, there can be absolutely no doubt that nothing except a drastic inspection law can now rescue the beef industry as related to the farm and the packing industry as related to the great cities from almost utter demoralization. Nothing can do that except a law which shall give the public confidence in what they are to eat. Therefore, it seems to me of the very greatest importance not only that we pass a law, but that we pass one that shall stand the test of the courts.

It looks to me as if the provision to which I have just called the attention of the Senate—and that same vice, if vice it be, runs through every provision of this amendment—is bringing this case precisely within the rule laid down in the case of the United States v. The Knight Company, to the effect that you can not go into a manufacturing establishment—and, after all, that is what these packing houses are—to determine what particular part of their manufactured articles would enter into interstate and foreign commerce and what particular part of them would be confined to intrastate commerce.

This amendment assumes that the inspector can do that. Congress has no power to authorize any such procedure; but Congress does possess a power, clear, undisputed, and ample, to accomplish the very purpose which all of us have in our mind under its power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations. It is entirely competent for Congress to say that a given article, except in a given condition, is not a fit subject for interstate and foreign commerce. Even that power may be grossly abused, but that power, in my judgment, exists.

It is, in my opinion, a simple matter to provide an inspection law which will be unassailable in any court. If I were to draw it, I would provide that hereafter it shall be unlawful to transport from any State to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or from any State to any foreign nation, any meat or meat products unless they have been inspected in the following manner—and I would then prescribe regulations to which every packer must conform in order to have his product become the subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In the suggestions the Senator made, by whom would he have this beef inspection?

Mr. BAILEY. Precisely as you are going to have it done in this amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then even under the Senator's provision it would be inspected by a Federal inspector?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In the packing establishments?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. So that, after all, the matter would come back to an inspection of the meat in the place, if you choose to call it so, of manufacture by a Federal inspector.

Mr. BAILEY. Very true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I can not see the difference between that and the method provided in the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the manner in which you do a thing frequently determines your right to do it. No Senator here will contend that the Federal Government could send an inspector into one of these packing houses to make an inspection and punish the packer if he denied access to this inspector.

The power to superintend the cleanliness of a manufacturing establishment in any State of this Union is a State and not a Federal power. The power to prescribe the rules by which manufacturing is governed is a State and not a Federal power. But the power to determine what may enter into interstate commerce is a Federal and not a State power. When you provide that a product shall not enter interstate commerce except after it has been inspected according to your laws, what happens? Every packer who seeks to engage in interstate and foreign commerce must allow his meat to be inspected; but the only penalty you can put upon him is to deny him access to interstate and foreign commerce if he refuses or fails to comply with your law. You can not make it a crime. You can not say that he must open his doors to inspection and authorize the inspectors to superintend the interstate and foreign commodity, as distinguished from the intrastate commodity; but you can say: "Unless you permit this man to inspect this meat as we prescribe, you shall not be permitted to engage in interstate and foreign commerce with your product."

Mr. President, I do not think that distinction is a mere refinement. There will be Senators and there will be great lawyers outside of this body who will contend with great force of reason that even the provision as I suggest it can not be sustained in the courts. With all due deference to them, I express the confident opinion that the Federal Government can exclude from it any article which it deems unfit to enter interstate and foreign commerce, but the Federal Government can not assume the police supervision over the canneries and packing houses of this country.

I merely venture to suggest to the conferees that even if they do not entirely agree with my apprehension as to the constitutionality of the amendment as it comes from the House, they will agree that the form I have suggested relieves the question from legal difficulty, so far as it can be relieved.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. PROCTOR. I think I understand the point the Senator from Texas makes, and it strikes me favorably. I should like to ask, as a personal favor, if he will put in form, in writing, the change he would propose, and I will promise that it shall have earnest consideration by the conferees. I do not see that it would materially interfere with the purpose of the measure or its efficiency.

Mr. BAILEY. It would not interfere in the least, because I would provide the inspection almost exactly like that provided here, and you could not provide it too drastic to suit me; but I would still save the point that the only punishment to a packer who refuses is that he can not engage in interstate and foreign commerce.

The Senator from Vermont will permit me to illustrate my view. If the people of Illnois are willing to allow the packers in the city of Chicago to prepare meats out of diseased animals or in an unclean way, it is not a matter in which the people of Texas or Vermont have any concern, unless those citizens of Illinois undertake to ship that unwholesome meat to Vermont or to Texas. Then we do have an interest, and it is the very fact of that interstate interest which gives jurisdiction to the General Government. If the State of Illinois sees fit to allow these packeries to be conducted in a wrong way, and if the packers choose to confine themselves to intrastate commerce, they put themselves beyond the jurisdiction of the General Government, and we must let them pursue their own way in Illinois, according to the law of Illinois.

I am as ardent an advocate of States rights as any man living. It is sometimes a question in my own mind whether I do not carry my doctrine to an extreme limit. But earnestly as I advocate the doctrine of States rights, I will never insist that in a matter which concerns the people of the several States the Federal Government is powerless to act.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas a question, if the Senator from Wyoming will yield.

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I understood correctly the statement of the Senator from Texas, it was to the effect that the Federal Government has no authority to punish for the offense of shipping goods that have not been inspected, except to prohibit the producers from shipping them out of the State.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator did not quite understand me correctly, if he understood me to say that. I say that the Federal Government, first determining that a given article is not a fit subject for interstate commerce, has the power to make it a crime for any man to make that article the subject of interstate sale or transportation.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will agree, will he not, that while the General Government can not make it an offense to produce any article in any State unless an inspection is had, yet it can make it an offense, punishable by fine or imprisonment, for the producer to attempt to introduce such an article into interstate commerce without such inspection?

Mr. BAILEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that is what this bill intends to do.

Mr. BAILEY. Let the Senator read this provision.

Mr. McCUMBER. I admit that as it was read it seemed to me that this bill attempted to punish production without inspection, and I agree with the Senator, if that is true, it must be unconstitutional.

Mr. BAILEY. It not only attempts to punish the production, but it assumes a supervision over production.

It may be contended that it is an attenuated distinction between supervising the production as a matter of right, and supervising it as a condition precedent to engaging in interstate commerce. Suppose the bill gets into court—and it is very apt to go there—it would not go there in the present condition of the public mind; my own opinion is that the packers will now submit to anything which will restore public confidence in the wholesomeness of their products. But after it has been on the books a while, and public excitement and the public horror at these astonishing disclosures have subsided, and some man dressed in the authority which this gives him—and it is a most extraordinary authority in some particulars—will seek even to abuse this authority, and then this question will go to the courts. If the Senator will read the amendment he will find that it says:

> For the purpose of preventing the use in interstate commerce or foreign commerce, as hereinafter provided, of meat and meat food products which are unsound, unhealthful, unwholesome, or otherwise unfit for human food, the Secretary of Agriculture, at his discretion, may cause to be made, by inspectors appointed for that purpose, an examination.

And then follows the authority which I referred to a moment ago that assumes the power of the Federal Government to make the inspection first. It has no power to do that, because when the inspectors come to exercise that power and to determine which one of the sheep they are charged with the duty of inspecting is to go into interstate and which into intrastate commerce—when they come by the carload, sheep and swine and cattle—it is simply impossible to determine, and that impossibility, the court has said, is sufficient to prevent Federal jurisdiction over such a question. But as they all go in without reference to whether they are to become the subject of interstate or intrastate commerce, the Federal Government can say that not one of these shall ever become the subject of interstate transportation unless everything killed in this slaughterhouse is killed under this specific and definite inspection.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not intend to use much time. This matter comes before us in what seems to be a rather unusual way, and I may say that I am sorry that it comes up in this form. We have a rule, or if not a rule, a custom, which provides that matters in disagreement between the House and Senate upon the passage of a bill by both Houses shall first go to a committee of conference without instructions; that subjects shall be submitted for a full and free conference. But this matter having been brought up in this irregular or informal way, and having been discussed a couple of hours with arguments on only one side of the question, I deem it necessary in the interest of the live-stock men to take up at least one point which has been under discussion.

As to the packers, I have neither authority nor disposition to in any way stand or speak for them. They are ordinarily able to take care of themselves, I assume. The cattlemen and the packers are always at variance and upon different sides of the equation. It is true they are engaged in a business in which both are interested, but it is also true that one is the seller and the other the purchaser, which involves them constantly in rivalry. The live-stock men of this country believe, and I believe as firmly as I believe that any bill has passed this Congress at the present session, that if this charge is made against the packers, such charge—every dollar of it—will be collected from the cattlemen and also collected from the consumer, thus giving the producer less for his product and making the cost higher to the consumer. The injustice of such a result is obvious. We have legislated here for years, and the agricultural bill is full from start to finish this year, as always before, of appropriations for investigations concerning various products and things, every last one of which is at the expense of the Government.

Why should the poor cattlemen, because they may be in remote sections and not sufficiently represented in the halls of legislation, be made a sacrifice in this case and charged up with $3,000,000 for the next year for general meat inspection of the United States?

This whole matter of the meat-inspection amendment to the annual agricultural appropriation supply bill has been most unusual. It is a matter of great and vital interest. It is a matter which I am glad to have considered and legislated for; and, as I was remarking two days since, when I was taken from the floor by the expiration of the morning hour, we are all alike agreed as to certain points—cattlemen, packers, and consumers alike. We only disagree as to some of the minor ones. We all agree that this inspection is necessary, and that we are bound to provide for it.

But, Mr. President, Senators will recall that the meat-inspection amendment was put into the agricultural appropriation bill without a word of discussion. A measure of many pages was presented, and by an individual Senator, who moved its insertion as an amendment in the agricultural bill. The measure had not been before any committee for consideration—a most unusual proposition. I suppose if I had been present—unfortunately I was away—I should perhaps have done exactly as other Senators did—let it pass, because the object sought was a very meritorious one. But I should have expected then, as I expect now, that, after the matter was once inserted, it should have consideration at the other end of the Capitol, and then further consideration by the conferees, and possibly still later consideration on this floor, if the conferees should report a disagreement.

When I first saw the account of this in the newspapers I was on a railroad train en route to Washington and could not, of course, be influenced by the cattlemen or by the packers, and when I read it and the action of the Senate I was immediately convinced in my mind that there was a portion of the amendment which would have to be remedied somewhere and at sometime during the consideration of this legislation, and that we would have to put the charge for inspection upon the United States as a whole rather than to impose it upon the cattlemen. Why should the cattleman be called upon to pay more than his part for the examination of this meat? He stands in the same position as the consumer, for he is himself a consumer. If the Government pays it, he pays his full part, and if it comes in the way of direct taxation, all his property bears it in just proportion. Why should he pay all the expense when he and the consumer are alike interested? The consumers are far more interested, for that matter, in this question than are the cattlemen. And yet you would have the cattleman, after his product has left him and gone to the manufactory—you practically do it in this amendment—charged with the entire expense of the inspection of raw and finished product, and you would provide everywhere else, in all other industries of every nature and kind, that the United States shall pay the cost of all inspections, excepting alone live stock and its products.

Mr. President, we now have in our bill appropriations for investigations of the white fly and the brown-tailed gnat and the bobtailed beetle, and the Lord only knows what else, all at the expense of the United States. There are large appropriations for investigating losses caused by these insects. Since when, after expending a hundred thousand dollars or more upon the brown-tailed gnat, is it wrong to charge the United States a matter of two or three million dollars for the examination of the immense meat product, which is the greatest industry of the entire line of American industries? It amounted last year to nearly a thousand million dollars. What is an expense of $3,000,000 to that? A mere bagatelle.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] day before yesterday seemed quite excited about the probability that hereafter we should not provide for this inspection, if left to Congress to do it. Is that a fair proposition? Is it fair to presume that those who come after us will be less honest and less liberal and less decent than we are?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is not an imputation upon the honesty of those who may come after us. It is merely a statement of a well-recognized truth, and perhaps a wise one, all things considered, that the last thing a Congress can be gotten to do is to increase an appropriation. I will ask the Senator if he does not think, from his long and useful experience as a practical legislator and a Senator who has had a great deal to do with appropriations for many years, that it will be many a year before Congress can be induced to raise the $3,000,000 permanent appropriation provided for in this bill?

Mr. WARREN. I am glad the Senator has asked me that question. The history of the Senate and of Congress ever since I have had any connection with it proves that it is always ready to make adequate appropriations for manifestly proper purposes, and would be ready to extend this $3,000,000 to $30,000,000 if necessary; if the industry became large enough and the necessities were great enough.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The answer to that is the fact which is now before us, to wit, that for years the present appropriation has been notoriously and admittedly inadequate. The facts have been placed before the committee, but notwithstanding that we have not been able to get an appropriation above $750,000. This is proved by the fact that now the bill proposes to increase that appropriation at one single stroke 400 per cent. If it be right now to appropriate $3,000,000, certainly it was wrong heretofore to appropriate only $750,000.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I have——

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. I beg pardon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. PROCTOR. It strikes me there is a little weakness in the Senator's comparison between the gypsy moth, the brown-tailed moth, and beef. The brown-tailed moth comes to us as a sad dispensation from Providence, while the beef comes from the packers, and we can hardly hold Providence responsible for the latter.

Mr. WARREN. One is the act of God and the other is the act of the packers—is that it?

Mr. PROCTOR. But we can hold the packers responsible for good beef.

Mr. WARREN. I fail to see the difference, because both are expenditures to protect and better the condition of the industries of the United States.

As to the question asked by the Senator from Indiana, I want to say to him that I have served longer on the Senate Committee on Agriculture than any other man now in the Senate. I have had under consideration—together with other Senators—every bill since the annual agricultural appropriation bills have been sent to that committee, with the exception of this year, when I was absent a part of the time. I do not remember that there has been any time when the Department of Agriculture has asked of the committee a certain amount for certain expenditures in the way of inspection that it has not received it. The Department did not estimate for $3,000,000 this year——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say in reference to that, so that I may not be misunderstood, that I think, from the information I have upon the subject, no criticism whatever can be made of the Committee on Agriculture; that it, I understand, at all times has met the demands of the Department when the facts were laid before it.

What I point out to the Senator is this: Taking Congress as a whole, there has not been a large enough appropriation secured, and the fact that we are now appropriating $3,000,000 a year permanently instead of $750,000 is absolute proof of that. If, as the Senator says, hereafter the business requires it, we will appropriate $30,000,000 for this inspection, the very serious condition arises which the Senator himself foresees, that as this business grows the appropriations must grow; and if the system of making appropriations for inspection for every industry that requires inspection is to be applied to all the country, it will soon become such a drain upon the Treasury that it can be reckoned only by the tens of millions. The scientific and just way is that every industry which needs inspection ought to pay for that inspection.

Mr. WARREN. When that time comes let the tail go with the hide, let this industry go with the others, but do not now single this out as the only one industry that must pay for an enforced Government inspection, and thus lay a burden upon a class of people but for whom many great stretches of country would still be a howling wilderness, a people who have not the influence in the halls of Congress which other interests have, to be sure, but a deserving, loyal people nevertheless. Congress should not, in the examination of their products, make them pay the cost, through the packers, of this Government inspection, while every other industry in the United States—fruit and vegetables and all other products which farmers and others raise—are inspected at the expense of the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. I yield for a question. I hope the Senator will not go into extensive speech making.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator objects——

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to call his attention to this fact: The Senator's passage is eloquent, but not convincing. But I can not permit the Senator to state, without showing him the error of his statement, that this industry is singled out, because national banks must pay for their inspection, and immigrants pay for their inspection, and oleomargarine pays for its inspection, and others. I shall not interrupt the Senator again.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is at the end of his list. The "and others" will not appear, for there are no more.

And none of those mentioned is in the slightest degree parallel with the case at issue. The Senator from Indiana says that immigrants pay a head tax upon entering this country. Well, why shouldn't they? They pay the ocean steamship fare to get here, and there is no reason why a man from another country who wishes to come here and avail himself of all the benefits of this Government, this great rich Republic, should not pay an entrance fee. The Senator pays an entrance fee when he goes to a circus. I pay an entrance fee when I go to the theater, but all these things, like the flowers that bloom in the spring, have nothing to do with the case; have no parallel, no similarity, no intelligent comparison.

Take national banks: They are not examined for their sanitary condition or wholesomeness, but they are checked up by accountants, and it is true that the banks pay for this accounting work. The banks pay in the first instance, but now let us see from whom they collect it. Why, from everybody; from the body politic. National banks are everywhere in the United States. All classes do business with them. Therefore, if they charge the cost of this inspection up to their various customers, by including it in their running expenses, and by making their business pay a certain profit above expenses, just as a merchant charges up the freight when he estimates the cost he will charge his customers for his goods, they touch each and every one just as if the Government levied the tax directly upon all the people, whereas in this live-stock inspection the men upon whom it falls are a little handful, comparatively speaking—those who furnish animals for slaughter—so there is no parallel, or level, or comparison in this case.

Again, as to oleomargarine: On this you collect the fine imposed for the permission to manufacture a counterfeit, an adulterant, if you please, the intention being to have it fall upon the one who furnishes the raw material—which in this case, to some extent, is the packer—but more especially upon those who have rancid, spoiled butter, which ought to be thrown into the sewer, but instead is furnished to the oleomargarine makers for renovation. The consumer, through this Government inspection, is informed of what he is buying, knows that he has a tax to pay, and pays it, because even then, with the tax, he can buy an adulterant, wholesome, perhaps, in his estimation, but still less expensive than the genuine.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. To show how inaccurate the Senator is, the Senator from North Dakota gives me another illustration—that of grain.

Mr. WARREN. And its inspection is paid for in this very appropriation bill. The grower may pay for State inspection, but the United States inspection is paid for by the United States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; by a special tax for that purpose.

Mr. WARREN. No; this bill directly appropriates for the purpose of inspection of wheat, and the bill, as it lies here before me, is irrefutable proof of what I say.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can have his quarrel upon this subject with the Senator from North Dakota. I shall not interrupt the Senator again, except to say this: The Senator is making his speech upon the assumption that the "poor cattleman" will pay the cost of inspection. That is a statement which I deny. In my opinion, and in the opinion of many other men who have studied this question, the packers will pay, and the truth of it is found in the fact that Mr. Wilson, their representative before the House committee, said that the cost of inspection would come out of the packers' pockets.

Mr. WARREN. Ah, he stated that in a technical sense. I have looked it up. Of course they will pay it in the first instance, and Mr. Wilson is not going to expose his hand or purpose in his testimony.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I interrupt the Senator? I promise him not to take his time any more. If it be true that the cattlemen must pay for this inspection, as those who represent them say, and if it be true that the consumer must pay the cost of the inspection, as some others say, then why is it, if the packers are not going to be injured, that the packers chiefly have objected to this payment?

Mr. WARREN. That is the assertion of the Senator from Indiana. I have not the slightest scintilla of proof that the packers have had anything to do with it except to object in general terms. It was stated here yesterday that these various telegrams asking that the Government and not the growers pay this inspection charge probably originated in Chicago with the packers, and as proof of that the fact of their similarity was cited. The Senator from Vermont read from four or five different types which it was said originated in Chicago. I have not any evidence to sustain that. I have evidence, on the contrary, that they originated with stock associations. The different live-stock associations would send out to their members the shortest form they could. Take the telegrams as they come to me. There are many scores of them—several hundred, in fact. They do not bear the earmarks of having been instigated by the packers or of having originated in Chicago. Mr. President, I will come back to that point a little later with some telegrams I have here.

I would state right here that if the stock raisers and farmers of the country knew that this inspection fee could be collected from the packers, and at the same time something—anything—could be put into this legislation to absolutely prevent the packers from recouping themselves from the stock raisers and consumers, they would not raise a finger or file a telegram or write a letter to prevent the enactment of the proposition to make the packers pay the fee. The stock raisers of this country have not been making the profit they should have made during the past ten years, when the price paid by the consumer for beef, mutton, and pork is considered. In fact, the stock raiser of the West dependent upon that industry alone has not been able to keep out of debt. He does not blame the consumer; he does not blame the general policy of the Government in reference to the live-stock industry, but he does blame the packer, the middleman, who, as he believes, has through combinations beaten down the price paid for the live animal and put up the price of meat to the consumer. As stated before, the stock raiser is not asking to have this inspection fee paid by the Government through any love he bears for the packer.

Now, as to the matter of appropriations, I have served a few years upon the Senate general Appropriations Committee, and I am not willing that the Appropriations Committee or that Congress shall stand under the accusation that they are not willing to provide for every reasonable expense of the United States, and especially so in respect to anything that provides for better sanitary conditions, more wholesome food, or a higher standing of our industries, in the way of Government inspection or otherwise.

The Senator expressed some alarm that if we should need more than $3,000,000 hereafter we would not appropriate it. Does the Senator know how fast our annual appropriations are growing? I looked last night at a few figures. Going back but ten years, the sundry civil bill has grown during that time from about $35,000,000 to about a hundred and five million dollars. It is true $25,000,000 of the sum appropriated in the present sundry civil bill is for the Panama Canal, but even then we have a bill more than twice as large as it was ten years ago.

Look at the miscellaneous appropriations. We find that then we had a third of a million or less, and they are now reaching over three and one-third millions. Look at the deficiencies, and you will find that you are appropriating many, many times as much in deficiencies as you were ten years ago. Look at your Navy. You then appropriated $29,000,000 annually, and now you appropriate over $100,000,000. Look at the Army. You appropriated then $23,000,000 for the Army, and you now appropriate over $72,000,000. For the Post-Office establishment you then appropriated $87,000,000, and you now appropriate nearly $200,000,000, or at least something like one hundred and ninety-odd million dollars. The Agricultural Department appropriations were then three and one-third million dollars, and now, without this proposed addition, they are about $8,000,000. Here are the District of Columbia appropriations, which also have been growing, and if not in the same proportion, they have more than doubled in that length of time.

Does that look as if Congress does not provide for the agricultural and other interests of the nation? Is the charge fair that there is any disposition on the part of Congress toward cheeseparing in the appropriations, or that Congress itself is actually doing that?

These are the approximate figures, which need be glanced at only to show how little foundation the Senator has for the belief that Congress does not keep pace in appropriations of public funds with the growth of the country:

	1895.	1906.
Sundry civil	$35,000,000	$105,000,000
Navy	29,000,000	100,000,000
Army	23,000,000	72,000,000
Post-office	87,000,000	200,000,000
Agricultural	3,300,000	8,000,000
District of Columbia	5,700,000	10,000,000
Miscellaneous	300,000	3,300,000
Total	183,300,000	498,300,000

Thus for these items alone we appropriate more than twice and nearly three times as much money as we did ten years ago.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator knows, as we all know, that the appropriations are growing enormously. Why, then——

Mr. WARREN. So is the country growing enormously in its industries.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why, then, should we add to these enormous appropriations, which are mounting on the upward scale, this new appropriation? It is $3,000,000 now, but if the principle be once admitted no one can tell how much it will be in the future.

Mr. WARREN. I have confidence that those who come after me will be as wise as I am, and that those who come after the Senator may possibly be as wise as he is, and that as the industries of this country grow and the expenses required to conduct them grow they will be met. It is nonsense, arrant nonsense, to express a fear of what those who will come after us are going to do or not do when we know that the country has stood for a hundred years and more, and it has been respectably solvent all the time.

I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator that the peculiarity of the original introduction of this measure suggests that we ought not to be too stiff-necked in our adherence to the verbiage of that first production.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator suggests that this inspection shall be made as a matter of economy—economy of a very high order. From my observation and such information as I have been able to obtain, if the packers were required to pay 6 or 8 cents per head for the inspection of stock they would deduct a dollar from the man from whom they purchased and add about $5 to the person to whom they sold. I have not any doubt whatever that this fee would be deducted from the price paid to the stock raiser.

Mr. WARREN. There is no doubt of it.

Mr. CARTER. Multiplied by ten and added to the man who consumed or purchased the product multiplied by a larger sum.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Wyoming permit me to ask the Senator from Montana a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand that the packers are not averse to making a profit.

Mr. CARTER. No suspicion has arisen in our section of the country that they are.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think they would not be particularly opposed to any scheme by which they could increase their profits. If this is an admirable scheme for increasing their profits, a scheme by which they can take from the price they pay the cattleman and add to the price they charge the consumer, it will swell their profits by millions. If that be true, then why is it that the packers are so earnestly resisting the putting of the fees upon them? From the very first of this controversy until now the packers have vigorously, almost savagely, resisted the payment of the fees for inspection, and it was so stated——

Mr. WARREN. I can tell the Senator why.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was stated that that was their position by their representative before the House committee, Mr. Wilson, who objected to the system of the packers paying the fees.

Mr. WARREN. I can tell the Senator why.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Indiana well knows that the packers, in and out of season, have opposed this inspection scheme entirely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And this particular provision.

Mr. CARTER. The opposition to the payment of the inspection fees was the stand made in the last ditch. The stock raiser understands what the fixing of fees means in the market price of the animal he offers for sale. I have no doubt that for a time, intimidated somewhat by public clamor, desirous of recovering a market lost through alleged abuses, the packer would, perchance, not apply to the farmer the full penalty that would ultimately be applied; but unquestionably in due time the farmer would pay the freight, and the consumer would pay it also.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana, in describing what may happen with the charge for all the inspection expenses, reminds me of the old story of the miller in ancient times when every grist of grain was tolled at the neighboring custom gristmill for the expense of grinding. The miller had nine sons, and on reaching the mill when the grist was grinding, he would say, "Sam, did you toll Deacon Brown's wheat?" "Yes, father." A little later, "Robert, did you toll that grist?" "Yes, sir." "Dan, did you toll that grist?" "Yes, sir." And so on down through the line, until all nine sons had said they had tolled the grist. Then the old man would say, "You are all a pack of darned liars, and I will toll it myself." [Laughter.] That is probably about what the packers would do if you collect fees from them. We would all pay.

But the Senator from Indiana asks why the packers object to paying for the inspection providing they can recoup themselves from the live-stock men? Now, this is the condition, and everybody ought to see it. An inspection made at the expense of the Government, by the Government inspectors, and under the United States stamp will pass current everywhere without suspicion, with nations and individuals, while on the other hand let those people in Germany and elsewhere who have been fighting for years against the introduction of our meat products have the advantage of saying to their customers, "this inspection amounts to nothing, because it is simply another way of cheating us; the packer hires these inspector men; they are under his pay and under his influence"—and therefore the stamp of the United States would not carry what it ought to in the way of a guaranty and what it does carry in the other industries where the United States places the examination under men hired by itself and paid from the common fund.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish to say to the Senator from Wyoming that I will withdraw the question I asked him, and I shall not ask him any other questions, because I want to see the bill go to conference to-day. We have a unanimous-consent agreement made to take up another matter at 3 o'clock, and, therefore I hope he will not answer the question I have asked him.

Mr. WARREN. I think that is an invitation to cut my remarks short.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Not at all. I do not object if the Senator speaks until 3 o'clock, only I want to get the bill into conference.

Mr. WARREN. I will say I am very sorry to have to appear in this case at all. I think the Senator from Indiana has done a great service to the nation in introducing this subject and getting it into the agricultural appropriation bill, but I think it was one of those escapades, one of those elopements in the night, where haste forbade very much clothing, or very much forethought or deliberate consideration; and therefore you should not ask the Senate to wink at it and stick to it in conference as a wise, sound, well-considered, seasoned measure in all its terms and language, when, as a matter of fact, it never has been considered in committee, and you should not ask us to swallow it whole as originally presented, notwithstanding the House of Representatives, the Speaker of the House, the President of the United States, and many Senators believe that the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana, as good as it is, and as much as it means, can possibly be helped a little by amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is not going to provoke me to an answer to that, because I want to get the bill to conference to-day.

Mr. WARREN. I notice the Senator's haste, and that is what brings him to his feet. Ordinarily I say the Senate and its conferees should stand for the work of the Senate; but there is certainly no rule of honor, none of practice applicable, that would prevent our conferees from immediately receding from certain points, and accepting amendments which the House has made to the amendment. This especially because of the non-consideration of the amendment by this body.

I had supposed from reading the newspapers that we had arrived at a complete all-around understanding as to this bill, and that we had what might be called a "Roosevelt-Beveridge-Cannon-Wadsworth bill." The Senator from Indiana ought to have gone to conference without a word of debate with his measure. He ought to thank those who have improved his bill. There would be honor enough for all, and the Senator from Indiana should not object to being one of four gentlemen of that class, and he should not expect it to go thundering down the ages of time as the Beveridge bill alone when he could as well have accompanied with him the President of the United States, the Speaker of the House, and the chairman of the Agricultural Committee on the other side as compatriots in this great and admittedly meritorious measure. We have had a Bland-Allison and a Hepburn-Dolliver law. Why not, then, a Roosevelt-Beveridge-Cannon-Wadsworth act?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I want again to say to the Senator that he is not going to induce me to make any reply at all, for it is necessary to get this bill to conference at once.

Mr. WARREN. I observe that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That brings no answer from me. I want this bill to go into conference to-day.

Mr. WARREN. I observe that

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am going to say that two or three times more to the Senator, if necessary.

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly; that would be quite like the genial Senator from Indiana. Mr. President, I was most willing to trust leaving this work to the conferees in the usual way. But without consultation with me, and unlike the usual way, this discussion was sprung here the other morning and I had some seven minutes before 2 o'clock and the special order to answer the eloquent speeches of the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Vermont, and others. I am as anxious as the Senator is to see this bill get into conference, and I am more anxious, probably, than he is to see the conferees recede from this one point and let the cattlemen feel that they are not treated as enemies of their country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What does the Senator say about the other point?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield further to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What does the Senator say about the other point—the date on the cans?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator put me in such haste to accommodate him in his desire to get the bill to conference that I said beforehand I would take up but one single matter and discuss it, and I will leave the canning date to him, in confidence that he will do what is right about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is right.

Mr. WARREN. I have more confidence in the Senator's figures and dates than I have in his experience about cattlemen in the field and on the ranges——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say——

Mr. WARREN. I have a good deal to say if I had the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. WARREN. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will concede the Senator has more experience about cattle and cattlemen than I have; but what does he think about the date on the cans?

Mr. WARREN. I thank the Senator for his compliment and for his help in getting me along and making my speech short. Now he would like to have me go into that can subject.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I would be glad to have the Senator's opinion about the date on the cans.

Mr. WARREN. Then, will the Senator withdraw his intimation that I should hurry through?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I believe I will prefer to stick to my intimation.

Mr. WARREN. Then I will compliment him, and I will say that I have the utmost confidence in the Senator's ability to "rush the can" and to bring in the proper measure, wherewith we can find both can and contents. He can "rush the can" as he pleases, and I will undertake to follow him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know what the Senator means. Is that his answer to my request for his opinion about putting the date on the cans? If he is satisfied with it, I am.

Mr. WARREN. It is true, even though figures which roll over the tongues of eloquent Senators oftentimes have great terror in this body, it has without a word of protest and inside of ten minutes voted $50,000,000 for a certain object. I am aware that when you get into millions and give it your particular enunciation expressive of vastness and awe that this expenditure of $3,000,000 seems large. But you are talking also about a large industry. You are talking about an industry the value of the annual product of which, according to the United States census for the last year, was almost a thousand million dollars.

This unfortunate medical or surgical operation, if I may term it such, which you are about to perform—have in part performed—interferes with trade and has cost the live-stock men many millions of dollars already. And now, in God's name, let us have it over with soon, the quicker the better, and let the patient recover. But let us do it right while we are about it, and not wrong the loyal, honest live-stock growers on range and farm. A billion dollars of packing-house products alone, and $200,000,000 of that is what we export to other countries.

Now, if there is any one thing that all political parties and all Congresses have agreed upon during all the time since the foundation of this Government to the present it is that exports from our manufactures and from our fields, but especially from our manufactures, is the great interest which we should seek and the great accomplishment for which we should strive and endeavor. There is no doubt about that. Here we have an industry which annually is exporting merchandise worth $200,000,000. It seems to me that we should provide proportionately for that great industry, and when the little brown-tail gnat gets a hundred thousand or more in this appropriation bill, surely the bulls and cows and sheep and hogs, which bring a thousand million every year in meat products, are entitled to $3,000,000 from the Government for inspection fees.

If you are going to have an inspection of this product, it is to the interest of the United States and the people as a whole, leaving out private interests, that that inspection shall be one of the highest and best, so far as the regard of foreign nations is concerned as well as our own.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming, who is thoroughly acquainted with the stock business, is such a law as this necessary to give the people pure food? I notice that in Illinois (and I believe it is on account of transactions in Illinois that this law has been recommended to Congress) there is a law upon the statute books of that State which makes it a penal offense for any party to sell or offer to sell any impure food, or to kill for purposes of sale diseased cattle; and the laws of that State require strict inspection of the slaughter-houses in the State and strict inspection of the cattle killed for the purposes of food. I see that the laws in Missouri provide likewise——

Mr. WARREN. And so do the laws of Wyoming.

Mr. CLAY. And the laws in Kansas provide the same thing. If these laws in the States for the inspection of cattle, making it a penal offense to sell impure food, are strictly enforced, how would it be possible for diseased meat to be sold to people throughout the country?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's point is well taken, and I take pleasure in answering it. I answer it this way: If every State had such a law and executed it, there would be nothing left for the Government of the United States to do except to look after strictly interstate commerce, in the way of inspection of products that leave this country and which must have the inspection stamp of the United States Government to insure their acceptance and best sale in foreign countries. That would be all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. One moment, until I finish. That is the reason why heretofore (and I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to it) we have only appropriated seven or eight or nine hundred thousand dollars. It is because we have expected the States to take care of this matter. We have put enough money to the credit of the inspection fund to provide for just so much of it as we felt the legitimate interests would call for. Now, the Senator from Indiana believes, and some others with him, in an inspection of larger caliber, and I am ready to join him, but I am not willing that one class of people, a deserving class, and but a small class, shall pay that total expense when no other industry is thus treated.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WARREN. With pleasure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would supplement the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia by suggesting further that the Senate has recently passed a pure-food bill, which, taken in connection with the meat laws of the several States, assuming their enforcement, would constitute a complete and sufficient remedy for the evil that is complained of and sought to be remedied by this bill.

I desire further to say that it was only for Congress to provide a method of inspection supplemental to that already provided for in that bill, if it thought it necessary. I doubt if any further legislation is necessary on the subject.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator, Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. CLAY. The pure-food bill deals with articles of interstate commerce to be transported from one State to another. I wish to call the Senator's attention to this bill. It provides that the inspector appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the right to go into a State and inspect the slaughter pens, and if the slaughter pens are not properly constructed or ventilated, then the inspector has the right to destroy them. This bill also provides that he shall have the right to inspect the beef after it is killed, and if it is impure, to destroy it; and there is no appeal from his decision. The inspector appointed to go into the States and examine the cattle and the beef is the sole arbiter as to whether or not it is impure, and there is no appeal from his decision whatever in regard to a matter of so much importance.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, it is idle for the Senator from Indiana or other Senators to say that it is a usual thing to charge the inspection against parties engaged in business. He cites the two cases, national banks and oleomargarine.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I just wish to say to the Senator that, while the Government of the United States does not charge for the inspection, we pay for the inspection of every bushel of wheat that is sent out of our State into interstate commerce; we pay for its weighing, we pay for its grading, we pay for its inspection, whether it be in any terminal market in the United States, ranging all the way from about 25 cents per car to 75 cents per car, whether wheat, corn, oats, barley, or any other cereal that we sell upon the markets.

Mr. WARREN. By the arrangement of those interested in business they have provided that there shall be a fee paid, so that their grain, their corn, and their wheat may be graded and they shall know what is red this and brown that and blue the other, etc., that they may sell on the market. It is a part of the preparation for the market of their product. It is not an inspection to see whether it is rotten or wholesome. It is simply a part of the preparation, the expense, just the same as the threshing or cutting is, so far as grading the wheat and corn is concerned; and they have a right to tax themselves for it, if they wish.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Is it not the purpose of this inspection, or of any scheme of inspection related to this subject-matter, to make the article merchantable, to make it a matter of interstate commerce? Now, if a certain class of men are engaged in an industry and in order to give them a proper market, in order to get the full benefit of interstate commerce they should have it inspected, why not have them pay the expense, because it is for their benefit in order to make that product merchantable?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Minnesota will show me a way that we can force the packers to pay that and not charge it to the cattlemen, I have no fault to find with the proposition.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Wyoming that he does not represent the only cattlemen in this country. There are the range cattlemen who ship their cattle into the markets in a flood in certain seasons of the year, but the whole country is covered with a lot of small farmers who are shipping cattle every week of the year to Chicago and to other great points. Those cattlemen are not here objecting to this bill. It is simply the range cattlemen. So of all the men who furnish the hogs that are slaughtered and enter into interstate commerce, and a good deal of our meat products are hog products. That product does not come from the men who raise the range cattle. The Senator talks as though this was simply a question between packers and the men who range the cattle.

Mr. WARREN. I do not talk that way.

Mr. NELSON. It is a matter that the consumers are equally interested in and the men who raise cattle on small farms and furnish the steady supply of cattle throughout the entire year.

Mr. WARREN. Just so. The Senator can not provoke any quarrel with me about that. I accept his intimation that I know nothing about cattle raising except on the range. But I will say to the Senator from Minnesota that I have been engaged in the cattle business all the way from Cape Cod to the Rocky Mountains, and I know about as much as a man can know who has all his life been interested in it of the differences between the farmer, stockman, and the range cattleman. I want to say to the Senator that when you beat around you find where the men stand. It matters not whether range cattle or farm cattle; if they must be shipped to the packers, they have all the same interest; and they are all asking that this expense shall be put upon the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Not the farm cattle. I have had a small amount of cattle to ship and sell every year, and I have not had a protest from any of the farmers of Minnesota. The protest has simply come from the packers—the men running the packing establishments. Not a farmer in my State has objected to paying this.

Mr. WARREN. Has the Senator had a lot of telegrams and letters asking him to see that it was paid by the packers?

Mr. NELSON. I have had a lot of what I call "machine telegrams," made to order at the expense of the packers. That is the only kind.

Mr. WARREN. But I ask him whether the farmers whom he so valiantly represents here have been wiring him asking that this provision shall carry; that the packers shall pay the cost of inspection instead of the United States.

Mr. NELSON. The farmers are in favor of a proper inspection. They are quite ready that the packers shall pay the cost of it, even if it comes out of them. They regard the matter of a few cents, 6 or 8 cents a head on a steer or a cow, 4 or 5 cents on a hog, and 2 or 3 cents on sheep, as a small matter, and they are not objecting to it.

Mr. WARREN. Very well. Then this is the condition the Senator wishes us to believe exists, that all the stockmen we have heard from all over the United States stand upon one side of the question, and that is that the Government shall pay the inspection, and hence it is assumed by him that all the balance not heard from shall stand on the other. That is the Senator's argument, is it? If so, he is dead wrong. It is safer and nearer the truth to assume that all those not heard from stand with the balance, and if heard from would supplicate that the Government pay for this inspection.

Now, Mr. President, right at that point, talking about telegrams that are machine made, I have explained that. Those telegrams have been sent, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] said, in five or six different forms. I find the stock association of one State has sent to its people out on the frontier—away from the telegraph office, away, perhaps, from the mail, or sent by mail on horseback—"There is danger of our interests being injured; you should telegraph your Congressman;" and what is more natural than to give them a form?

But the bulk of my telegrams have not run that way. I have in my hands a couple that came in when this matter first came up, and before they could possibly have heard of the suggestion that telegrams were concocted in Chicago and sent out.

I have one here from the Hon. Ora Haley, of Laramie, Wyo., a man who has been in the cattle business proper in some capacity in probably more than half the States of this Union, a man whose business now is very large, a man who has been in both branches of the Wyoming legislature, was a Presidential elector two years ago, and has held other public offices; a man who is in the banking business as well, who is largely interested in cattle every day in the year, buying or selling or grazing, etc. He has for years been either president or a high officer of the Wyoming Live Stock Association. I will send his telegram to the desk and have it read, and see if it sounds like a machine telegram.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegram.

The Secretary read as follows:

LARAMIE, WYO., June 20, 1906.

Hon. F. E. WARREN, Washington, D. C.:

The discussion of packing-house methods has done great injury to the live-stock interests of the West. It is impossible to say how much, because the evil effect is not yet fully developed, and I only hope that it may not result in disaster. Every stockman in the West is in favor of a most rigid inspection law, but we all feel that it would be a great injustice to place the cost upon the packers, which means, of course, that the producers would ultimately pay the bill. All the people are interested in pure food, and so let them join in paying the expense. Kindly give a copy of this to Senator CLARK and Mr. MONDELL, and we all hope that our delegation will approve of these views.

ORA HALEY.

Mr. WARREN. Now, Mr. President, that is simply a representative telegram. As I said a few mornings since and before I supposed this subject would be called up on the floor for debate, I was receiving a great many messages. I did not propose to burden the RECORD, and I sent up one as a sample, one that came from as representative a live-stock man as there is in the United States.

I am sending now to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from a man who represents money loaned by trust companies and others to various live-stock men, one who is constantly with them and who knows their feelings, who is interested himself pretty largely in cattle as well as through the trust companies that have the cattlemen's interests at heart.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

DENVER, COLO., June 21, 1906.

Senator F. E. WARREN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Stock growers are united in wanting the benefit of complete inspection, but believe the purchasers of the product would lack confidence in certificate issued if such service is paid for by those inspected for the packers. Furthermore, the number of consumers benefited is far in excess of the number of producers whose product is inspected. This being a matter where the whole people are concerned, and to tax the producer by causing the packers to pay this fee would be unfair, won't you impress on the Senators the damage delays are causing the stock growers?

A. E. DE RICQLES.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, that telegram expresses the idea that if we are to have an inspection we ought to have one that will inspire confidence all over the world. On the other hand, referring to what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said, the consumer is interested. He is the man of all others who is interested. Then let him pay his part of it and let the stockman pay his. If we look through this agricultural appropriation bill we find many things very generously provided for, of which the Senator has spoken. We find provision made for the boll weevil, for the gypsy moth, for the flight of birds which are taken care of; the fowls are taken care of—the health and habits of fowls are promoted by an annual appropriation. Why not tax the hens the tenth part of a cent each? You are going to tax the other part of the barnyard, if you tax the cow.

The poor cow is to be taxed from 5 to 8 cents, because she happens to be a cow, and is destined for the packer, but the inspection of the turkeys and the geese and the hens and the ducks that frolic around her is paid for by the United States. Somebody may say that as to the birds of the air that fly over the farm and over the man who is milking the old cow in the barnyard, and as to the hens that cackle, the ducks that quack, and the geese that gabble, it is proper that they should all go free, but the poor cow has got to pay from 5 to 8 cents, notwithstanding that added to these the insects, the fauna, and the flora, and, in fact, everything in sight except the cow, receives attention, investigation, or inspection at Government expense. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] says it will be from 3 to 5 cents a head; the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] says from 5 to 6 cents; but when we get to the enthusiastic Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who last spoke, he assumes that it will be 8 or 10 cents on every head of neat stock. We do not know what it will be.

When we come to insects in the barnyard, miscellaneous insects, those that crawl and those which fly in the air, their inspection is provided for and paid for by the United States; but the cow must be under a special act, because she comes under the head of "cattle" to be killed for meat.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator regard the meat packers as miscellaneous insects?

Mr. WARREN. I will leave that to the Senator from Minnesota to decide. He can not get any sympathy from me for the packer.

We appropriate money to provide for the general cereals, and to provide particularly for the orchards and the fruits which we raise, and for the insects that attack the fruit. But the poor cow alone must pay.

It is true that you put a tax on oleomargarine a few years ago. I suppose that was because oleomargarine has some relation to the cow; I do not know why otherwise it was done; but it is different with the meat products. You say to the world oleomargarine is simply, as it was declared by many Senators on this floor, an imitation, a counterfeit, a fraud; and that is the reason you put an internal-revenue tax on it. You put it on because those who wanted to eat this cheap imitation article would pay the tax.

It seems to me we are going too far when we come to the cattlemen to yoke them up with oleomargarine manufacturers and say, "Now, cattlemen, pay your assessment, no matter whether you can continue your business or not. Under the tax that may be laid we will assess you 3, 5, 6, 8, or 10 cents a head.

The Senator from Vermont says, with a twinkle in his eye and a good deal of satisfaction, that we have got a nice bunch of money in the Treasury out of that oleomargarine tax. We taxed the producers of that article much more than it cost to carry the law into effect. I see in that twinkle the proposition that he proposes to pile up millions upon millions of dollars in the Treasury of the United States by a sliding tax of 3 or 5 or 8 or 10 cents per head upon meat stock, and which is a tax against the cattlemen.

Mr. President, the mode of doing business by the packing houses is one that may not be understood by those who have no interest in the business, but it is different from almost every other market where purchases and sales are made. On the one side packing houses and their products are governed by the world's price for which they can dispose of their product. You may say that they have got us in the hollow of their hand in this country, because they are butchering practically all the live stock.

Well, now, passing that for the moment, here are $200,000,000 of exports of meat, etc., that have to go out to all the different markets of the world. They have to meet the cheap cattle of Australia and of New Zealand; they have to meet the live stock of all the world when they send out that $200,000,000 worth of meat. Therefore these packers can not force the price of meat upward beyond a certain standard. Upon the one side in the disposition of their products there is a check. Now, turn to the other side. How do they purchase? They have their check in the standard of the price they get. Then they have certain expenses that they must incur in their business. Therefore, when you put upon them a burden of a certain amount, it must come out of the raw material; that is to say, out of the cattle they buy. How can they do that? I will tell you.

It is a fact that by the utilization of everything except the bleat of the calf in the packing house they have arrived at a cheapness of slaughter and manufacture of meat that has wiped out pretty nearly all competition. Therefore the cattleman is compelled in many parts of the country to ship his cattle to the packer; there is no other available market. As to the wheat and other crops, they are bought where there is a standard. The man who raises and sells them near home pockets his money and is through with the transaction. But when you come to live stock for slaughter, after they are loaded on the cars they are taken down over the railroads to the stock yards at Chicago or Omaha or Kansas City or St. Joseph or St. Louis or at Buffalo, and then you must take your chance on whatever price you can get.

There is no standard, as there is in the case of wheat and corn, and there is no way by which a standard can be fixed, as there is in the case of cereals. In the case of cattle you have a perishable product that is losing value every hour it is in the yard and deteriorating every moment of time. If you hold it over but one day you have a loss, perhaps, of 25 cents a hundred, and you are absolutely compelled to take what is offered you.

The price is fixed upon one side—the world's price for meat—but on the other you can not get a regular price fixed, and you have to take the price that is offered on the day you arrive. What would be more natural than that any additional expense to the packer shall be taken out of the man who ships the cattle? There are stockmen who have been shipping their stock to the packing houses ever since that industry was inaugurated. They know the packers; they know the manner of collecting for expenses. Do they know whether or not they will ultimately have this inspection tax to pay, or do the Senators, who represent other industries and who are not interested in this particular industry, best know? Who know best, the cattlemen who have been associated with the packers all this time, or do others with no experience?

As expressed in one of these telegrams, live-stock men want this inspection to be thorough; they want such an inspection as all the world will take as final. They do not want it said that the meat product has not had an adequate inspection, because Armour and Swift and Nelson Morris and others are paying the inspectors themselves as their own hired men.

Of course when it comes to the matter of inspection, a man who is thoroughly posted upon it will understand it; but you take the ordinary individual, who has given no special attention to it, and let him read or hear somebody say that the inspection is to be paid for by the packers and he will have no confidence in the Government stamp obtained in that way.

The inspection law which I am supporting, and which we are all supporting, I hope, is, in my judgment, a severe blow to the packers. In my judgment, the next severest blow is to make the Government pay it, holding aloof entirely from any communication with them, except that they shall bend their necks entirely to the will of the Government under the law. When the Government inspects Armour's meat, as now, it is sold on Armour's trade-mark. When you put an inspection mark by the United States, when you put a stamp on every can—I am coming back to that can again—you have made the manufacturer of every can equal, so far as the United States inspection is concerned. Armour's trade-mark and Swift's trade-mark and Nelson Morris's trade-mark go to the four winds, so far as the standard is concerned—everything goes under the inspection of the Government, because the Government upon all has placed its inspection mark, and it becomes Uncle Sam's trade-mark.

As to the great monopoly of the packers, I want to tell you that if you wish to do anything to hold the prices where they are and not raise them upon beef, you want to see that in your legislation you do not put any load upon the cattlemen. The cattlemen's profits day by day are diminishing in the United States. Where they raised cattle a few years ago cotton now grows; where they raised cattle a few years ago corn is now produced. You can not afford to put the farmer and stock raiser down under an expense that will greatly diminish the number of cattle unless you wish to raise the price of beef.

I want to say to you, looking at the question from all sides, that I believe you are doing the very best act that it is possible to do if you have this inspection by the Government itself, and have the Government pay for it. As I say, this little matter of $3,000,000 is a mere bagatelle in this great industry. If it is well guarded, the industry will flourish.

Mr. President, I have telegrams here from bankers in New York and Boston, whom I know personally. I know they are interested in the men who have their money upon the ranches and the farms and who are stock raisers. They know the stockmen themselves are asking that this inspection shall be paid for by the Government. I have here their telegrams and letters, all reading one way: "Have the United States Government pay the inspection." I will not burden the record with them, as it is already too long.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I am exceedingly anxious not to delay the ordering of this bill to conference, but if the Senator from Wyoming will permit me, I should like to have a letter read by the Secretary from the president of the Corn Belt Meat Producers' Association, representing practically the whole live-stock interest in the State of Iowa. I do that only because I desire to have their views expressed, considering the fact that that State is the chief live-stock producer in the United States.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know what the contents of the letter are, but I want to hear from a locality of that kind, whether it may be upon the one side or upon the other. The people of Iowa are, as the Senator says, in the possession of more live stock to-day than the people of any other State in the Union, and the stock is in the hands of simon-pure farmers, and not on the ranges of the scalawag range cattlemen.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read the letter sent to the desk by the Senator from Iowa.

The Secretary read as follows:

BUCKINGHAM, IOWA, June 2, 1906.

Hon. J. P. DOLLIVER, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I thought perhaps you might wish to know what the stockmen think of the Beveridge meat-inspection bill. It seems too bad that this whole matter has got into the condition that it has. It seems to me that this investigation could have been made and a proper inspection law put into effect without so much notoriety and a consequent loss to the live-stock industries of this and other States. I appreciate, however, that it is too late to make any change or to find fault over what has been done. In the first place, the stockmen have been for some time urging the necessity of a more thorough and complete method of inspection. This has been agitated by members of our association and other individuals for a long time. We have felt that the only way to insure the best returns for our products was to place them above reproach in every way and every particular.

The present bill meets the hearty approval of the stockmen, I believe, with this exception. We feel that we must necessarily bear a large burden of this expense. The business is going to be demoralized, in fact, it is demoralized, without part of the expense being borne by the stockmen, and we are willing to do our share. The only point that appeals to me is that in the matter of inspection the fees should be paid by the Government or by the ones that are to be benefited by the law. We do not feel that we should be made to bear all of the burden. If the bill is passed making the packers or the different companies bear the expense of the inspection, as I understand it to read, it only means that that amount will be charged off from the price the live stock brings in the different markets. This, in my opinion, would be a greater burden than we should be charged with. Is there not some way this inspection can be put into effect, as strong and complete as possible, but making the inspection fees out of appropriations made by the General Government? It seems to me the only question is whether or not this business is to pay the expenses of an inspection that rightfully belongs to the people at large.

I would like to have you give this matter your earnest consideration and let me know how you feel in regard to it. We have known for a long time that the inspection on all meat products that were used at home was not sufficient. We have urged that this be made more complete and carried on in a manner that would leave no opportunity for just the kind of articles to be written as are now prevalent in the press. This kind of notoriety is one of the most serious menaces to the business we have at the present time.

Thanking you for your many kindnesses and the good work you have done for the live-stock interests of this and other States, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

A. L. AMES,
President Corn Belt Meat Producers' Association.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, does that bear the stamp of the packing house? In my judgment, it is an honest letter from honest people, and represents the farmer and stock grower of one of the thickly-settled States and not the rangemen of the West who furnish range cattle. I commend this letter particularly to the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. Let him square it with his remarks of a few minutes ago.

Mr. President, not only is the cost of the various services I have enumerated paid by the Government, but there are many others. There is, for instance, our quarantine service, applying to live stock as well as to people, and paid by the United States. We might as well say that the expenses of our Light-House Service, with its light-houses along the coast, shall be taxed upon commerce, and that it shall be charged up to the vessels as they go by. We take pleasure in paying our part of it, though we may live in the heart and center of the country, far removed from the seaboard.

We expect that the expense of everything of that nature will be distributed all over the coutry and not charged up to one small class of people. Every man and every woman does or should eat meat. All are interested alike in the purity and wholesomeness of it. Then why not let all pay it, instead of charging it to a small number of men interested in a not too well paying business, the farmers and others interested in live stock?

I have endeavored to explain, and I again call attention to the peculiar situation regarding the marketing of live stock, and to the fact that it is really a commission-house business between live-stock grower and packer. You really consign your stock. It amounts to that. There is not one-tenth of 100 per cent. of stock on the ranges starting for market that is sold and paid for before it starts or upon any price calculated upon or promised until it reaches the market; but it is fixed upon that day and paid for at the price offered by those who control the market on that day.

I have some figures here, Mr. President, showing the magnitude of this industry which I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD. There is very much more that I should like to say, but I am as anxious as any Senator present to get this matter into conference.

Under the circumstances and in the way in which this matter came before us, I think we have a right to ask our own conferees to recede without opposition on this one point, the House provision being asked for by this great industry, and I trust that the conferees will make no resistance whatever to taking the House proposition as to the payment by the United States of the cost of inspection.

As to the other matters in connection with this amendment, its constitutionality, and so forth, I leave that to those better able to debate it—the great lawyers of the Senate. I send to the desk the statement to which I have referred, ask that it may be printed, and I drop the matter for the present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the statement referred to by the Senator from Wyoming will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement referred to is as follows:

OFFICIAL REPORT DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND LABOR, JUNE 21, 1906.

Exports of meats and meat products from the United States in the eleven months ending with May aggregated over $180,000,000. These figures for eleven months show a larger exportation of meats and meat products than in the corresponding period of any other year in the history of our export trade, and show an increase of practically 60 per cent when compared with the figures for the corresponding months of 1896, a decade earlier.

The total value of meat and meat products exported in the fiscal year 1906 will approximate $200,000,000, and will probably exceed that of any earlier year.

All parts of the world are purchasers of American provisions. The lard exports of 1905 went direct from the United States to seventy-five different countries and colonies, the largest quantity to the United Kingdom, valued at $17,500,000.

Bacon, which stands second in importance in the value of meat products exported, goes largely to the United Kingdom, which took in 1905 practically $21,000,000 worth out of the total of $25,500,000 worth exported.

Great Britain is by far the largest purchaser of American meat products. Of the $75,000,000 worth of bacon, ham, fresh beef, and canned beef exported in 1905, the United Kingdom took in $66,000,000 worth, or practically 90 per cent of the total; of the total exports of meats, valued at $100,000,000, she took $80,000,000 worth, while of the $40,500,000 worth of cattle exported in the same year she took $36,750,000 worth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a moment. After the wretched and revolting exposé that has been made of the condition of things in the packing houses at Chicago, I have very little sympathy for the men who are engaged in that industry, men who have made their millions and their tens of millions, and who, if they had been men of public spirit and correct impulses, would have had their packing houses as free from filth and disease-breeding conditions as is this Senate Chamber. They have absolutely neglected the conditions that ought to have existed, and have horrified not only this country, but the nations of the world, because of the conditions that were found to exist there.

Mr. President, I want an inspection of meats in Chicago, an inspection as thorough as human ingenuity can devise. I feel like felicitating myself and my associates in this Chamber, in view of what has been spread before the world, that we are permitted to be here to-day. Almost every day I hear of the illness of some friend, and very often the information comes to me that it is due to ptomaine poisoning. Why should it not be, considering what has come to us as a matter of record knowledge?

I have listened to the reading of the letter which was sent to the desk by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] and the telegrams which were sent to the desk by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. They are for a rigid inspection, but they want the Government to pay for it. I recall the fact that Artemus Ward once said that he read and had been told that boils were good for the health of the human family. He said he had made an investigation of that and found it to be true, but he wanted the boils to be on the other fellow. [Laughter.] So, Mr. President, these people think inspection is necessary, and they say it ought to be thorough in the interest of human health, but they want the Government of the United States to pay for inspecting meats which, if they did their duty, would not need an inspection.

I do not believe that the Government ought to have this burden of $3,000,000 placed upon it for next year and $5,000,000 the next, and perhaps $10,000,000 in a few years, for inspecting the meats that pass through the slaughterhouses of the great city of Chicago and other cities of our country. I do hope, Mr. President, that on this point the conferees on the part of the Senate will stand unflinchingly and will not yield, and that this burden may be placed where it properly belongs.

I do not see why it could possibly fall upon the producers—the men who raise and sell the cattle to these packing houses—as the Senator from Wyoming contends. My fear is, in view of the conditions that already exist, that it will fall upon the consumers, instead of the producers. These packing houses form the great meat trust that makes it impossible for a farmer in New England to raise cattle for the market, because the men who sell it are boycotted by this great trust; and I apprehend that, if the packers are made to pay the cost of the proposed inspection, they will find a way to raise the price of their meats beyond the exorbitant price that they have been asking the consumers to pay for the last ten years. I know of no reason why this tax should be placed upon the cattlemen, but even if it should be, it seems to me that it is more a matter of justice and right that that great industry, which has not been suffering very much until this exposé came of conditions in Chicago, should bear the burden, rather than that the taxpayers of the entire country should be compelled to do so.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks that, in the event of these inspectors being appointed by the Government and then being paid by the packers or the purchasers of the cattle, they could be held to a strict accountability? Would they not, under such conditions, in a short time favor the men who were paying them their salaries?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think so, Mr. President. We do not find any difficulty with our bank examiners in that regard. They do their duty, notwithstanding they are paid by the banks of the country. It seems to me such a suggestion is a reflection upon the men who would represent this Government in performing that duty.

But, Mr. President, I will pass on. I have only one other point that I desire to make, and that is that I trust this bill, when it emerges from conference and becomes a law, will adequately provide for the labeling of all the canned products of the manufacturing establishments of the country. I believe that immense harm has come to the consumers of this country because of the conditions under which foods have been canned and sold to the people of the United States. I hope that a provision is in the bill—and if it is not, I trust that it will be added to it—that all canned products should have not only the date of inspection placed upon them, but the date at which the product itself was placed in the receptacle.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. At the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], whom I love as I would a brother, I refrained from entering upon a discussion of the canning business; but I want to ask, simply to get the opinion of the Senator now on the floor, whether he feels any apprehensions that if we require the placing of labels on meats, the demand of the consumers and their desire to know the date will cause us to go further and provide for the labeling of all canned food products? I do not know that I should oppose such a movement; in fact, I am rather of the opinion that if a bill should come here next winter to take up this whole subject, I might favor it; but I should like the Senator's opinion, whether he thinks it would not end with the date of inspection being placed on all food products put up in cans, in bottles, or in any other small packages?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should hope that that would be the result, Mr. President, because I believe that when a citizen of this country purchases an article which has been canned and put upon the market, he has a right to know whether it is one year or ten years old, and he has a right to protect himself from consuming a product that, because of its age, is possibly a detriment to health and life.

Mr. President, that is all I meant to say. I want these labels to protect the people from imposition. I want the inspection to be so thorough that there can be no doubt that it will carry out the purposes we all have in mind, and then, Mr. President, I want the Government to be relieved from paying for the inspection, which is so slight upon the producer or upon the men who slaughter the animals as to be a matter of very little consequence. If it costs the farmer or the producer only 6 or 8 cents to have a cow or a steer inspected, it is not going to do any great harm to the man who raises cattle on the ranges or elsewhere, even if he has to pay for it. But, as I before said, I see no reason why this burden should be placed upon the producer at all. On the contrary, we should legislate so as to place it upon the packing houses of the great cities of the country, as is contemplated by the Senate amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the first consideration with respect to meat products is that they shall be produced under cleanly and healthful circumstances. The inspection covers that point up to a certain degree only. After the materials have been produced, it is equally important that they shall reach the consumer in a condition which will not be detrimental or injurious to his health or offensive to his ideas as to what he will consume. There is nothing about which the human race is more particular or in respect to which it insists upon its rights with greater emphasis than that of selecting its food, each individual for himself, and he has a right to know all about the article of food that he is about to consume. He has a right to know it from the party from whom he obtains the product. There is no more important, in fact, in my judgment, there is no provision as important in connection with this matter as that of the date upon the inspection stamp of the goods, whether it be in cans, or whether it be in carcass.

It is not sufficient to provide in this bill that canned goods alone shall bear the date of inspection. As has been suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, they should bear the date when the article was placed in the can, so that you may know just how long that article has been on hand and form your own judgment as to whether you desire to take it or not.

It is the habit of the canners in the great centers in which that industry is carried on to ship their stale goods as far from home as possible, and I have seen opened in the camps on the frontier meats that had been in cans for four and five years before they reached the retailer, and had remained on the shelf of the retailer perhaps over a season. It is to prevent that condition that this inspection should be urged and that the label upon the can should bear the date when the article was placed in it.

But that is not all. The carcasses of meat that hang in cold storage, after they have been there four months, enter upon a condition of disintegration that is injurious, that results in the outside fat of the carcass becoming from day to day more unfit for consumption, until to-day you can go into the best restaurants and hotels of this country and call for a cut of roast beef with the outside fat on it, and when the waiter brings it to you it is a mere piece of lean meat with no fat on it. You ask him about it, and he says it is necessary to cut that fat off because it gets rancid and strong in cold storage.

The same is true of a steak. You may buy the choicest cuts of steaks to-day in the best restaurants and hotels, and you find that the fat is unfit to be eaten. Why? Because the meat has remained in cold storage beyond the period where cold will preserve it in a healthful condition. Have you not seen, those of you who have observed it, that after about three months in storage the outside fat upon the carcass takes upon itself a yellowish green tint? It is the result of the process of disintegration resulting from cold, which is the equivalent of the disintegration that results from heat.

So I say that not only should the cans be stamped as to the date when the article was placed in it, but that the carcasses that hang in cold storage on Pennsylvania avenue here, for instance, which have been there sometimes for perhaps more than two years, should also be stamped. Remember the investigation only a few weeks ago in Pittsburg, where it was found that in the elegant marble-lined cold-storage receptacle of one of the hotels in that city carcasses of meat had hung about four years. Of course it can not become putrid and offensive to the smell when it is under the influence of the condition of freezing that pertains to cold storage. But it is not necessary that meat should become putrid or offensive to the smell in order that it may contain ptomaine poisoning.

I know of an instance where a carcass of choice meat from one of the big packing houses in Chicago was sent to a camp of workmen. It was purchased because it was of exceptionally fine appearance. It was packed cold, solid, almost frozen; and it put about eighty men in the hospital inside of twenty-four hours, because it had been in cold storage for over two years, and the conditions that I have suggested had come about. These facts are not isolated. You can duplicate them hunreds and thousands of times on the frontier where they bring back to us the cattle that we raise on our ranches.

I have no sympathy for the cold-storage system. I broke it up in a city in which I lived. Five years ago I started on a crusade against cold-storage meat, and I have never voluntarily eaten a mouthful of it since that time. I drove out of business in that city the representative of Armour and the Chicago packing houses by persuading the community in which I lived to patronize only the meat dealer who bought his cattle in the country in which he lived and slaughtered them and prepared the meat in a cleanly way and handed it over his counter free from these objectionable features. By creating that sentiment there we built up a prosperous dealer in meat, who bought our own cattle from our own ranches and our own farmers and sold it to the community. Public sentiment would do much to drive it out. I believe the best condition in the cattle business exists when every farm has its little bunch of fat cattle and sends them to market with about an inch or an inch and a half of fat on the ribs, fresh killed and cool, and prepared for consumption. It distributes the business locally throughout the country. Who is benefited by this great concentration of capital, this concentration of what they call enterprise in the city of Chicago? It had better be distributed among a thousand farmers and a thousand communities in the country.

I will not occupy more time, as I understand the chairman in charge of the bill desires to use the few remaining minutes.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, my motion is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments, disagree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate No. 29, and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. SIMMONS.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, asks conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. TAWNEY, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, and Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives, disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. BERRY.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 9, 32, 33, 34, 35, 38, 47, and 55.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 5, 11, 12, 14, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 48, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 57, 58, 59, and 63; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6.

Amendment numbered 7: That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with amendments as follows:

In line 10 of said amendment strike out the colon and insert in lieu thereof a period.

In lines 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 of said amendment strike out the following: "Provided, That hereafter the pay and allowances of chaplains shall be the same, rank for rank, as is or may be provided by law for officers of the line and of the Medical and Pay Corps, all of whom shall hereafter receive the same pay on shore duty as is now provided for sea duty: And provided further, That the present pay and allowances of any officer now in the Navy shall not be reduced: Provided further," and insert in lieu thereof, as a new paragraph:

"That all chaplains now in the Navy above the grade of lieutenant shall receive the pay and allowances of lieutenant-commander in the Navy according to length of service under the provisions of law for that rank, and all chaplains now in the Navy in the grade of lieutenant shall receive their present sea pay when on shore duty: Provided, That naval chaplains hereafter appointed shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant (junior grade) in the Navy until they shall have completed seven years of service, when they shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant in the Navy; and lieutenants shall be promoted, whenever vacancies occur, to the grade of lieutenant-commander, which shall consist of five members, and when so promoted shall receive the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant-commander in the Navy: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to increase the number of chaplains as now authorized by law or to reduce the rank or pay of any now serving."

In line 17 of said amendment, commencing with the word "That," have a new paragraph; and in lines 17 and 18 of said amendment strike out the words "pay and;" and in line 21 of said amendment strike out the words "pay and."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 15, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment, after the word "million," strike out the words "three hundred thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 5 of said amendment strike out the words "immediately available and to be;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the last line of said amendment strike out the comma and the words "to be immediately available;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "two million nine hundred and fifty-two thousand four hundred and fifty dollars;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 6 of said amendment, after the word "graduation," insert the following: "or that may occur for other reasons;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In said amendment strike out the words "one million" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 61, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 76 of the bill, at the end of line 5, insert the following: "But this provision shall not apply to or interfere with contracts for such armor already entered into, signed, and executed by the Secretary of the Navy;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$33,475,829;" and the Senate agree to the same.

On amendment numbered 13 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

EUGENE HALE,
GEO. C. PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
GEO. EDMUND FOSS,
H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
ADOLPH MEYER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, before the question is put on agreeing to the report, I desire to make a few observations relating to amendments 32 and 33 in the naval appropriation bill. Amendment No. 32, put on by the Senate committee and adopted by the Senate, provided an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars "toward construction of a graving dock of concrete and granite, to cost, in all, $1,400,000," at the Pensacola Navy-Yard, Pensacola Bay.

I see by the report of the committee that the Senate conferees recommend that the Senate recede from the amendment. I have no complaint to make of the Senate conferees in the matter; in fact, I personally feel under some obligations to them for holding out against the contention of the conferees representing the House against this amendment. But before allowing the matter to go to a vote I desire to present to the Senate as briefly as I can the reasons why I thought proper to introduce this amendment at the present session.

It is not a new project, Mr. President. As long ago as November, 1903, I introduced a resolution in this body directed to the Secretary of the Navy, requesting him to inform the Senate whether or not it is desirable, in the interest of the Navy, that the Government of the United States should construct and own a graving dock, of capacity sufficient to dock the largest battle ships of the Navy, at some port on the coast of the United States on the Gulf of Mexico; and if, in his judgment, the same is desirable, to also inform the Senate at what port on said coast such dock should be located and the probable cost of the same when completed.

In response to that resolution the Secretary of the Navy addressed a communication to the Senate, a part of which I will read.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. CARTER. I call attention to the unanimous-consent agreement heretofore obtained, and with the permission of the Senator from Florida, in conformity with that understanding, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CARTER. I yield.

Mr. HALE. Is this in accord with a unanimous-consent agreement of the Senate?

Mr. CARTER. It is.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. PENROSE. It was made yesterday afternoon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It is the order of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Then I shall call up the conference report on Monday morning.

Mr. TILLMAN. In order to relieve the situation as far as I can, I suggest to the Senator from Montana that unless the Senator from Florida, who wants to discuss this report, shall take more time than I think he will, it will be agreeable to me to wait, and if no one else is pressing for the enforcement of the unanimous-consent agreement, I will not feel aggrieved if the debate goes along for a while. We will not consider the agreement as at all abrogated.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know of any precedent for the abrogation of a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. TILLMAN. Except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MALLORY. If the Senator from Montana will permit me, I do not care to interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not propose to consume any very considerable amount of time in the remarks I propose to make in this subject.

Mr. HALE (to Mr. CARTER). Hold up for a few minutes.

Mr. MALLORY. I think probably it would be very well to go into executive session under the unanimous-consent agreement, and I will as soon as possible thereafter resume what I have to say.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], if this matter can be disposed of by 3.30 o'clock, while not desiring to modify the unanimous-consent agreement, I will enter the motion and have it pending.

Mr. HALE. That is all right. We will be all through by that time.

Mr. CARTER. With the understanding, of course, that the motion will be made at the moment the conference report is disposed of, if it shall be disposed of at this time.

Mr. HALE. The motion is made and withheld.

Mr. MALLORY. In response to the resolution which I have just read the Secretary of the Navy communicated to the Senate his views as embodied in the report made to him by the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks, and that report is as follows:

At the present time there is no dry dock of large capacity upon the Gulf of Mexico which is accessible at all times. The steel floating dry dock at New Orleans Naval Station has sufficient capacity to receive the largest battle ships, but experience has shown that it can not be counted upon as being available at all times for such vessels, because of limited depth of water.

There is at present no other dry dock south of New York of such capacity, and none such is now authorized for any point south of Charleston, S. C. Under this present situation a continuous seventenths of the southern and eastern coasts of the United States is without a dry dock of sufficient size and at all times accessible for the docking of a large part of its Navy afloat.

This is a situation which ought not to exist longer than is absolutely unavoidable. Congress has recognized the desirability of proper docking facilities upon the southern coasts by instituting inquiries through boards of officers as to the most eligible point for the same, which have strongly appreciated such need; and commanding officers of squadrons, in their reports to the Navy Department, have dwelt upon the advantages to be gained by such provisions, having felt their need when cruising in those and adjacent waters. The interests of our Government are rapidly increasing to the south of our own territory, and events are crowding in that part of the world which bid fair to require the continual presence of a considerable naval force. It has already proved inconvenient to repair to the north coast for docking facilities, and it might easily occur that their absence in southern waters would prove a calamity.

The harbor of Pensacola Bay is the best upon the Gulf of Mexico (indeed, upon the entire southern coast) in which to establish a dry dock of the largest class. The entrance to the harbor is now of sufficient depth, the situation is favorable, and the expanse of water is fine and ample for the assembly of a squadron or fleet.

The Bureau recommends the graving type of dock. It is better suited to the docking of vessels, safer and more convenient, and should always be adopted, except under local conditions rendering the location or founding impracticable.

Replying specifically to the inquiries in the resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, the Bureau would state that it is desirable to construct a graving dock large enough for the largest battle ships of the Navy upon the Gulf of Mexico, and that the navy-yard upon the bay of Pensacola is the point where it should be located. Its probable cost would be $1,300,000.

The Secretary of the Navy adds:

While concurring in the view of the Bureau of Yards and Docks that the construction of such a dry dock is desirable, I must say in addition that many other public works not yet undertaken ought, in the larger interests of the Navy, be given precedence.

That was Secretary Moody, in December, 1903. The last report of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Bonaparte, in taking up this question, recommends again unqualifiedly the construction of a graving dock at the Pensacola Navy-Yard. From Charleston, S. C., where there will be a dock, down to Galveston, the last deep-water port on the Gulf of Mexico, is a coast line from 2,500 to 3,000 miles in extent. Between those two points there are three floating dry docks. There are two now at the Pensacola Navy-Yard, and one, as this report states, at the New Orleans Naval Station. The two docks at the Pensacola Navy-Yard are floating docks—one a wooden dock, and the other the iron or steel dock which the Government, for some reason quite inexplicable to me, allowed itself to be cajoled into purchasing from the Spanish Government after our recent war with Spain. It is a dock of 10,000 tons capacity. It requires about 45 feet of water in which to sink it in order to admit vessels that are capable of going into it. There is no other port on the Gulf of Mexico, except perhaps New Orleans, and no port on the Atlantic coast at which that dock can be used.

But in addition to that objection there is a very serious one in the fact that this dock is of a capacity which is neither one thing nor the other. That is, the nominal capacity of the steel dock is too large for small vessels and too small for our armored cruisers and battle ships. It could not take on a battle ship or any of our first-class armored cruisers. Practically it has accomplished nothing. Since being located at Pensacola the Government has permitted, certainly on one occasion and possibly on several others, merchant vessels to be docked in that dock, and so far it has been so good. But for any purpose connected with the Navy it is absolutely useless and might as well be sold for junk.

The small dock at the Pensacola Navy-Yard is, as I have said, of wood. It is a dock of 2,000 tons capacity, and can take on it our smaller gunboats and smaller cruisers. It is used constantly and is very effectual in assisting the administration of naval affairs down in those waters. But it is too small for any vessel above eighteen hundred or two thousand tons displacement, and is practically useless for any purpose other than very minor repairs.

The Navy Department, Mr. President, as the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks has indicated in this report, is disposed to discourage the building of floating docks, for the reason that when you come to put a vessel of 15,000 or 16,000 or 17,000 tons into a floating dock there is always an element of serious danger. In addition to that, it is a fact that in very few ports, if any, of the United States, unless they are dredged out for that purpose, can be found a sufficient depth of water in which to use effectively one of these large docks. It was reported to the Naval Committee that the dock the construction of which was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy, to be located somewhere on Chesapeake Bay, would require a depth of 60 feet of water in order to sink it to enable a vessel to get into it. There is no port in the United States that I know of in which such a depth of water can be found. In the harbor of Pensacola there is a point very close to the navy-yard at which 9¼ fathoms, or about 55 or 56 feet, of water can be found, and that, I think, is the deepest water of any that can be found to any extent in any of our ports, except, perhaps, the Mississippi River in front of the city of New Orleans.

The harbor at Pensacola has a depth of water on the bar of 31 feet. It has been the rendezvous for the North Atlantic Squadron for several years past until this spring. Last spring a year ago every battle ship on the Atlantic coast, from the latest built at that time down to such vessels as the Massachusetts and the Texas, entered that port and remained there for a month or more, engaging in target practice every day, going outside of the port into the Gulf of Mexico. There is no question whatever as to the depth of water being amply sufficient for the present needs of any of our naval vessels. Pensacola Bay is 30 miles long, with an average width of about 6 miles, and the nations of the world could send their entire fleets there, and they could be safely anchored within that harbor.

Below the city of Pensacola, some 5 miles by water and 7 by rail, is situated the navy-yard, which is somewhat unique in its relation to the country adjacent.

As early as 1827 the Government realized the advantages of establishing a navy-yard at that point, and it reserved an area of about 2½ miles in length and about a mile in width on which to construct this navy-yard. As time elapsed the navy-yard was built up, and it stands there to-day equipped with all the necessary buildings, with machine shops, foundries, blacksmith shops, boat shops, and all the requirements for a first-class yard. It is not, in fact, in the condition of a first-class yard because Congress has ever since the civil war been somewhat reluctant to add any very great improvements to it; but of recent years new buildings have been erected, new machinery has been installed, and to-day the yard is in a position to perform whatever duty in the way of repairing vessels of the Navy that it would be likely to be called on to do in the event that a dock were located at that point.

Mr. President, I was struck with an argument that was used by a gentleman elsewhere with reference to a matter of this kind, in arguing that it was undesirable to establish a graving dock, because it would require an additional expense for the necessary machinery, buildings, etc., in order to carry out the programme of repairs that would be prosecuted for vessels brought to such a dock.

Mr. President, the Navy of the present day is an expensive affair; it is something that necessarily must cost the Government a great deal; and it would be absurd to say that an argument based on such a proposition as that would be listened to with patience by those who are interested in the development of the Navy. Necessarily if you have a dock for repairing vessels that need repairs you may have the appliances in close proximity to that dock which are necessary to use in making repairs, and the fact that the Government will have to incur an expense because of the presence of the dock is no argument against the establishment of the dock if it is necessary.

Along the Atlantic coast, from Portsmouth, N. H., down to Norfolk, at a distance of certainly not more than 200 miles apart, will be found a line of docks provided by the Government. That is no reason why we should protest. I think it is very proper that these necessary accessories to the Navy should be provided for. But, Mr. President, from the harbor of Charleston, S. C., as I have said, to Galveston, Tex., a coast line of certainly 2,500 or 3,000 miles, there is not a dock into which one of the larger vessels of the Navy can be placed.

The Panama Canal is about to be built. We will necessarily have to keep a fleet in the Gulf of Mexico, as was the case anterior to our civil war. There is no telling what complications may arise between us and Mexico, or between us and Central America or the West Indies, and the argument for the establishment of a naval base on the Gulf of Mexico is unanswerable. To have that naval base complete it is essential that you should be able to make all the necessary repairs at that base without having the necessity of sending vessels up into the northern waters.

The Government, it is said, contemplates establishing a navy-yard or naval station, with a dry dock, at Guantanamo, in Cuba. That may be, and it may be a good idea, but, Mr. President, Guantanamo is in a foreign country. It is on the south side of Cuba. It is cut off from the United States by many hundreds of miles of water. The only way of getting your material there is by shipment by sea, and great difficulty, I think, will be found in handling the repairs on ships that have to go to Guantanamo for that purpose.

At the Pensacola Navy-Yard you have already supplied all the necessaries for that service. It is in close communication with the iron region of Alabama. It is only comparatively a few hours from Birmingham, and a shipment can be made from the town of Birmingham right into the yard itself without change or unloading freight.

Birmingham, as is well known, is becoming the Pittsburg of the South. Even at this early day the rolling mills of Birmingham are capable of doing most of the work that would be necessary in the ordinary repairs of a battle ship or an armored cruiser. If the Navy Department, through those gentlemen whose duty it is to give this subject careful consideration, recommend that such a dock as this should be established at this port, I can see no reason in the world why Congress should take the stand that it is not desirable.

We have every reason to urge not based upon a sectional claim. I do not undertake to compare the great number of docks that are in existence along the coast north of Chesapeake Bay with the great paucity of docks south of Chesapeake Bay. That comes naturally, probably as a result of things that we could not control. But the day has come now, Mr. President, when if we propose to administer our Navy with a view to the best conservation of the interests of the Navy itself, we should not locate all the appliances and machinery for the improvement of the Navy in an extremely northern section of the land.

I thought it proper, Mr. President, to make these observations, because it has been apparent to me that the subject is one which has not been considered by many Members of Congress. The necessity for a graving dock on the Gulf of Mexico at the particular point named in this bill is impressed upon the Senate by the recommendations of the Department running from 1903 to the present time, and I hope that while the conferees on this occasion have been compelled to give way, the idea embodied in the amendment will take root, and that when the next naval appropriation bill is presented we will be able, without any controversy, to provide for this very much needed pubic utility.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate further insist upon the remaining amendment and ask for a conference with the House.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist upon the remaining amendment, amendment numbered 13, and ask for a further conference with the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. TILLMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. In pursuance of the unanimous-consent agreement, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

INVESTIGATION OF INCIDENT AT WHITE HOUSE.

Mr. TILLMAN. I give notice that on Tuesday next, if I can find the opportunity, I will call up Senate resolution No. 126, directing the Committee on the District of Columbia to investigate the circumstances concerning the arrest of Mrs. Minor Morris, etc.

SUNFLOWER RIVER BRIDGE, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. McLAURIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 19854) to authorize the board of supervisors of Sunflower County, Miss., to construct a bridge across Sunflower River.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I do not like to object to this bill, but I am a little mystified as to the geography. I do not know where Sunflower County and Sunflower River are. I should like the Senator from Mississippi to tell me.

Mr. McLAURIN. As "Clip," a traveling correspondent of the New Orleans Picayune, measures all distances from Brandon, I suppose he would answer that question by saying it is about a hundred and fifty miles northwest of Brandon.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RESURVEY OF CERTAIN TOWNSHIPS IN NEBRASKA.

Mr. BURKETT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 17411) for the resurvey of certain townships in the State of Nebraska.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TERMS OF COURT AT BIG STONE GAP, VA.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11029) to authorize the holding of a regular term of the district and circuit courts of the United States for the western district of Virginia in the city of Big Stone Gap, Va.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF WILD BIRDS AND ANIMALS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13193) to prohibit the killing of wild birds and wild animals in the District of Columbia, which was reported by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment. I ask for its consideration at this time in order that the bill may be sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence in the amendment.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment, in section 6, on page 3, line 16, after the word "repealed," to insert:

But nothing in this act shall prevent the hunting of game birds on the marshes of the Anacostia River, or Eastern Branch, north of the Anacostia bridge, and on the marshes on the Virginia shore of the Potomac River east of the Aqueduct Bridge: Provided, That said birds are not hunted within 200 yards of any bridge or dwelling.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SCHOOL DISTRICT 57, NEZ PERCES COUNTY, IDAHO.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (H. R. 15506) authorizing the patenting of certain lands to school district No. 57, Nez Perces County, Idaho.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MEDALS FOR MILITARY SERVICE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. WARREN. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was refererd the bill (H. R. 16013) providing medals for certain persons, to report it favorably without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of War to procure a bronze medal to be presented to each of the several officers and enlisted men and families of such as may be dead, who, having volunteered and enlisted under the calls of the President for the war with Spain, served beyond the term of their enlistment to help to suppress the Philippine insurrection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN LEWIS YOUNG.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to ask for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5681) for the relief of John Lewis Young.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to John Lewis Young, of Washington, D. C., late captain Company C, Ninth Regiment Iowa Cavalry Volunteers, $150, being for the value of a horse lost by him in service during the war for the suppression of the rebellion.

Mr. SPOONER. Was the horse killed?

Mr. DOLLIVER. It died from exposure, without any fault on the part of Captain Young.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FLORENCE LAMBERT.

Mr. DOLLIVER. At the request of my colleague [Mr. ALLISON], who is not able to be present, I ask unanimous consent, on his behalf, for the consideration of the bill (S. 4387) for the relief of Florence Lambert.

The Secretary read the bill, and, there being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to Florence Lambert, who was permanently disabled while engaged in the employment of the United States Government at Frankford Arsenal, in the State of Pennsylvania, on or about September 3, 1898, $2,500.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC LANDS IN CHOUTEAU COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 19916) withdrawing from entry certain public lands in Chouteau County, Mont., and leasing the same to the board of trustees of the Montana College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts.

There being no objection, the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that section 22, in township 35 north, range 24 east, Montana meridian, be set apart and withdrawn from entry or settlement under the land laws of the United States, and shall be leased unto the board of trustees of the Montana College of Agriculture and Mechanic Arts, situated at Bozeman, Mont., for the period of ten years, for the purpose of maintaining thereon experiments in so-called "dry-land farming" and other experimental farming operations.

Mr. KEAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. CARTER. I presume there is a report, but it has not been printed.

Mr. KEAN. I think the Senator from Montana ought to explain the extent of the public lands which the bill withdraws.

Mr. CARTER. It is one section only, for dry-land farming experiments.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BATESVILLE POWER COMPANY.

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent to call up at this time for consideration the bill (H. R. 13106) granting to the Batesville Power Company right to erect and construct canal and power stations at Lock and Dam No. 1, upper White River, Arkansas.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MERCHANDISE FROM THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Philippines, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 19756) to amend section 2844 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to provide for an authentication of invoices of merchandise shipped to the United States from the Philippine Islands, to report it without amendment, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to add to the section referred to the following proviso:

Provided, That the authentication may be made by the collector or a deputy collector of customs in the case of merchandise shipped to the United States from the Philippine Islands.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

A. A. NOON.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3739) for the relief of A. A. Noon.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to hear the first part of the bill read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it, as requested.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the relief of A. A. Noon, of Provo, in the State of Utah, the sum of $1,407.55, the same being the amount of judgments and costs against him in suits by the Government of the United States for the extraction of gilsonite from lands within the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, under locations made in good faith and believed to be without the limits of the said reservation.

Mr. SPOONER. On its face it seems to be rather a peculiar bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in 1884 and 1885 Oakes and Bennett had a contract for surveying the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, and under their survey these locations were made. Mr. Noon and those associated with him interested in the matter located those claims, and they thought they were upon the public land, as Oakes and Bennett's survey at the time did not include these located claims within the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation. There was a dispute in 1898 as to the boundary line of the Indian reservation, and a resurvey was made, and the resurvey, made by Dougall, brought the claims within the reservation. Mr. Noon was sued for the value of the gilsonite which had been extracted from the mine, and judgment was rendered against him in the district court at Salt Lake for the sum of fourteen hundred and odd dollars, and that judgment was paid.

This gilsonite was taken from a claim located by him when he thought he was upon the public domain, and he had no intention whatever of defrauding the Government in any way. The bill simply proposes to reimburse him for the amount of the judgment secured against him and paid by him.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not like to object to the bill; but it seems that this gentleman took gilsonite from a mine which did not belong to him, but which belonged to the Government. He sold the gilsonite, as I understand. The Government sued him and secured a judgment, which was paid. Now, if what he received from the gilsonite equaled the judgment which the Government obtained against him, he is where he started, and he will be by this appropriation just that much ahead.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that the judgment which the Government obtained against Noon was for the exact amount he received for the gilsonite, but Mr. Noon had paid for the mining of it and had paid the freight on the railroad, and, in fact, he had in the first place spent a great deal more money than this in opening the mine to take out the gilsonite. He is out thousands of dollars more than this sum in the money which he spent in developing the mine.

Mr. WARREN. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Was this survey made by Government surveyors?

Mr. SMOOT. The survey was made under contract with the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Did the party locate the claim under the United States mining laws, as he had the right to do?

Mr. SMOOT. He did. The report shows that the location was filed in the regular mining record office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF HAWAII.

Mr. WARNER. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 18443) to amend the act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 30, 1900.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It provides that section 85 of the act referred to shall be amended to read as follows:

SEC. 85. That a Delegate to the House of Representatives of the United States, to serve during each Congress, shall be elected by the voters qualified to vote for members of the house of representatives of the legislature. Such Delegate shall possess the qualifications necessary for membership of the senate of the legislature of Hawaii.

Such election shall be held on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November of every even year and at such places as shall be designated by the secretary of the Territory. The ballot for Delegate shall be such as the legislature of Hawaii may designate, and until provision is made by the Territorial legislature the ballot shall be of pink paper and shall be of the same general form as those used for the election of representatives to the legislature.

The method of certifying the names of candidates for place on this ballot and all the conduct of the election of a Delegate shall be in conformity to the general election laws of the Territory of Hawaii.

The person having the greatest number of votes shall be declared by the governor duly elected, and a certificate shall be given accordingly.

Every such Delegate shall have a seat in the House of Representatives, with the right of debate, but not of voting. In case of a vacancy occurring in the office of Delegate, the governor of the Territory is directed to call a special election to fill such vacancy: Provided, however, That no vacancy shall be filled which occurs within five months of the expiration of a Congressional term.

The legislature of the Territory of Hawaii shall have the right to alter or amend any part of the election laws of said Territory, including those providing for an election of Delegate to Congress, and its action shall be the law, with full, binding force, until altered, amended, or repealed by Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUITS UNDER ANTITRUST LAW AND INTERSTATE-COMMERCE LAW.

Mr. LONG. This morning I submitted a resolution which was laid aside in order that the conference report on the agricultural appropriation bill might be proceeded with. An amendment was presented by the Senator from Georgia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks for the present consideration of a resolution offered by him this morning, which was laid over.

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], as I understood, objected, and therefore the resolution went over, under the rule, until the next day.

Mr. LONG. I did not so understand.

Mr. KEAN. It can not be taken up to-day, under the objection of the Senator from Indiana. I do not object to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the objection to hold only until after the agricultural bill was disposed of. The objection did not go to the substance of the resolution. Is there objection to its present consideration? The Chair hears none. Does the Senator from Kansas accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LONG. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be directed to furnish the Senate with a statement of all suits instituted by the Department of Justice under the Sherman antitrust law and the interstate-commerce law and the disposition made of such suits, including all suits brought under the so-called "Elkins law," when brought, character, and final disposition thereof.

The Attorney-General is further directed to report to the Senate what portion of the special appropriation of $500,000 heretofore made to enforce said laws has been disbursed and the manner of said disbursement.

Mr. SPOONER. I have some doubt about the wisdom of the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia as it is phrased. I do not think the resolution ought to be acted upon in his absence. I shall want to make some suggestions about it.

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over.

Mr. FORAKER. Just a word, Mr. President. I was looking about for the Senator from Georgia. I intended to tell him that I noticed in the RECORD a few days ago, I think within a week, that the same information was furnished by the Attorney-General to the House on somebody's resolution. It may not be in the exact form here called for, but the information was given to the House. I saw it.

Mr. LODGE. Let the resolution go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

SURVEY OF THE EVERGLADES OF FLORIDA.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to call up and put on its passage the joint resolution (S. R. 65) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to cause a survey of the Everglades of Florida to determine the feasibility and cost of draining said Everglades, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. KEAN. I do not think it can be passed now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the joint resolution will lie over.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to make one statement concerning the joint resolution.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. The other day, when this joint resolution was up, I was asked if this land belonged to the State of Florida—it had never been surveyed—and I answered, without having made special inquiry, that it did not, but that it would ultimately go to the State of Florida. Since then I have been informed that it has been patented to the State of Florida, although it never was surveyed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the joint resolution will lie over.

JOHN E. PHELPS.

Mr. PILES. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 3535) to authorize the President to appoint John E. Phelps, late brigadier-general of volunteers, first lieutenant in the United States Army, and place him on the retired list.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in line 5, striking out the words "brigadier-general of volunteers" and inserting "colonel Second Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers," was agreed to when the bill was under consideration yesterday. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "lieutenant," in line 8, insert "and the retired list is hereby increased by one for the said purpose: Provided, That no pay, allowances, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable to the said John E. Phelps for any period prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the President to appoint John E. Phelps, late colonel Second Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, first lieutenant in the United States Army, and place him on the retired list."

PLATT NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I introduce a joint resolution proposing that the name of the Sulphur Springs Reservation be changed to the Platt National Park, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 69) directing that the Sulphur Springs Reservation be named and hereafter called the "Platt National Park" was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to change the name of the Sulphur Springs Reservation, an Indian reservation now in the State of Oklahoma, formerly in the Indian Territory, so that said reservation shall be named and hereafter called the "Platt National Park," in honor of Orville Hitchcock Platt, late and for twenty-six years a Senator from the State of Connecticut and for many years a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, in recognition of his distinguished services to the Indians and to the country.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. In connection with the joint resolution I desire to have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior read.

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The letter will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 23, 1906.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication dated the 22d instant, inclosing a copy of the proposed "Joint resolution directing that the Sulphur Springs Reservation be named and hereafter called the "Platt National Park."

You request to be advised whether said resolution will "accomplish the object desired."

You are informed that, in my judgment, said resolution will legally change the name of the Sulphur Springs Reservation to the "Platt National Park."

I fully indorse the proposition and am heartily in favor of the passage of said resolution.

Respectfully, E. A. HITCHCOCK, Secretary.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrosed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROTECTION OF BIRDS.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 13190) to protect birds and their eggs in game and bird preserves.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game with an amendment, on page 2, line 3, after the word "court," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Black Hills Forest Reservation, in South Dakota.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any person to hunt, trap, capture, willfully disturb, or kill any bird of any kind whatever, or take the eggs of such birds on any lands of the United States which have been set apart or reserved as breeding grounds for birds by any law, proclamation, or Executive order, except under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture.

SEC. 2. That any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall, upon conviction in any United States court of competent jurisdiction, be fined in a sum not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months, or shall suffer both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the Black Hills Forest Reservation, in South Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

APPEALS IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15434) to regulate appeals in criminal prosecutions. The bill was reported unanimously by the Judiciary Committee. It has been read, and the amendment suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was adopted.

Mr. KEAN. I do not see the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] here.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Georgia has withdrawn the objection he made to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. The amendment to the amendment has been agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. And the amendment of the committee in the nature of a substitute has been agreed to as amended.

Mr. NELSON. Yes.

Mr. KEAN. I do not——

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Georgia has no objection to the bill. He has agreed that I may call it up at any time when he is not here. It is a bill reported unanimously from the Judiciary Committee, and a number of members of that committee are here to-night.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. I should like to hear it read, first.

Mr. PENROSE. It has been read.

Mr. NELSON. Let the substitute be read. It is unnecessary to read the bill as passed by the House.

The SECRETARY. The amendment strikes out all after the enacting clause and inserts:

That a writ of error may be taken by and on behalf of the United States from the district or circuit courts to the Supreme Court or the circuit courts of appeals, as prescribed in an act entitled "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, and the acts amendatory thereof, in all criminal cases, in the following instances, to wit:

From the decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indictment;

From the decision or judgment sustaining a demurrer to an indictment or any count thereof;

From the decision arresting a judgment of conviction for insufficiency of the indictment;

From the decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar, when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.

The SECRETARY. At this point the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] offered the following amendment to the amendment, which was agreed to:

Provided, That if on such writ of error it shall be found that error in the ruling of the court during the proceeding or trial and the verdict was in favor of the defendant, such verdict shall not be set aside.

The remaining paragraph of the substitute reads as follows:

In all these instances the United States shall be entitled to a bill of exceptions as in civil cases.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not understand that the amendment is at all relevant to the bill itself.

Mr. NELSON. It did not seem so to me, but the Senator from Colorado asked me to present it to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. If the bill provides for an appeal after verdict, I want to be heard against it.

Mr. BACON. It does not in any particular relate to a matter where there has been a verdict, as I understand it.

Mr. NELSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. The proviso applies to trial after verdict.

Mr. KEAN. If the bill is going to lead to any discussion, I shall have to object to its consideration.

Mr. NELSON. There will be no debate. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Colorado read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That if on such writ of error it shall be found that error in the ruling of the court during the proceeding or trial and the verdict was in favor of the defendant, such verdict shall not be set aside.

Mr. SPOONER. That proviso has no earthly applicability to the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I did not myself think it was relevant, but I agreed on behalf of the Senator from Colorado, inasmuch as he was going away, to offer the amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is incorporated in the bill, it may enlarge by construction the scope of what precedes it.

Mr. NELSON. I think it would.

Mr. SPOONER. I am opposed to changing the universal rule on that subject—giving the Government an appeal after verdict in a criminal case.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me to move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. SPOONER. I have no control of the matter. I think the Senator from Colorado must have misapprehended the scope of the bill itself.

Mr. NELSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota moves to reconsider the vote by which the amendment as amended was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I now ask that the amendment to the amendment be disagreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is disagreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that the substitute for the House bill is before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute is before the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the Teller amendment has been stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has been stricken out.

Mr. HEYBURN. So the question is on the substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole on June 19. If there be no further amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SPOONER. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator. I understand this applies only to questions which arise before the impaneling of the jury.

Mr. NELSON. Where the party has not been put in jeopardy.

Mr. SPOONER. That is plain in the bill?

Mr. NELSON. It is plain in the bill. It does not go any further.

Mr. MALLORY. Does it not apply to a motion in arrest of judgment?

Mr. NELSON. Not to a motion in arrest of judgment, only for insufficiency of indictment; not for any other ground.

Mr. MALLORY. That is, after the verdict is rendered——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I object to the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill goes over.

Mr. NELSON subsequently said: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] withdraws his objection to the bill which was under consideration a moment ago.

Mr. OVERMAN. I withdraw my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the provision with reference to the arrest of judgment should be stricken out, because that is after verdict, and the appeal in that case would raise the very questions that are suggested by the Teller amendment. The whole record would be up in that case. The Teller amendment was very properly disagreed to and the bill should be amended by striking out the provision with reference to the right of review from a motion in arrest of judgment.

Mr. NELSON. Let the Senator make that motion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I make that motion.

Mr. FULTON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that I think he surely is mistaken about the necessity of striking out that provision—the motion in arrest of judgment based on a defect in the indictment. There ought to be no objection——

Mr. HEYBURN. But the bill does not limit it to that.

Mr. FULTON. A party is convicted and judgment is arrested because the indictment is said to be defective. The Government claims that the indictment is good——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to hear that provision read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, let the bill go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under objection, the bill goes over.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the present consideration of two bridge bills in western Pennsylvania. I ask leave to call up the bill (H. R. 19566) to authorize the Coraopolis and Osborne Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Ohio River.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 19850) to authorize the Monongahela Connecting Railroad Company to construct a bridge across the Monongahela River in the State of Pennsylvania.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE BAYS.

Mr. ALLEE. I ask for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 21) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission to examine and report upon a route for the construction of a free and open waterway to connect the waters of the Chesapeake and Delaware bays.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution has been read. Is there objection to its present consideration?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. I beg to inquire if this contemplates following the route of the old Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

Mr. ALLEE. It gives authority to examine several different routes connecting the Delaware and Chesapeake bays.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBSEQUENT ENLISTMENTS, ETC.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 158) amending section 2 of joint resolution approved July 1, 1902, construing the act of June 27, 1890, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 2 of joint resolution approved July 1, 1902, so as to read as follows:

SEC. 2. That in the administration of the pension laws any enlisted man or commissioned officer of the Army, including regulars, volunteers, and militia, or any appointed or enlisted man or commissioned officer of the Navy or Marine Corps, who was honorably discharged from any subsequent contract of service entered into by him during the late war of the rebellion, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from all previous contracts of service as commissioned officer or enlisted man previously entered into by him with the United States during said war: Provided, That such enlisted or appointed man or commissioned officer served not less than six months under any subsequent enlistment, appointment, or commission; that his entire service under any said subsequent enlistment, appointment, or commission was faithful, and that he did not receive by reason of said enlistment, appointment, or commission any bounty or gratuity other than from the United States in excess of that to which he would have been entitled if he had continued to serve faithfully until honorably discharged under any contract of service previously entered into by him, either in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. WARREN. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the joint resolution to make a brief explanation of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Under the present law, if an enlisted soldier who was not honorably discharged renders subsequent service of six months and is then honorably discharged, that will be considered as an honorable discharge from the previous service.

Mr. WARREN. In other words, this effects a correction of his record?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; it corrects the law so that the soldier who served six months subsequently, and then afterwards served faithfully for three additional months, is entitled to an honorable discharge. You will see that under the law as it now stands you would have to take the last service instead of the service subsequent to the first, but prior to the last, and if the last service was less than six months an honorabe discharge therefrom would not operate as an honorable discharge from the first service. This is to correct that, and also to make it apply to those who were privates during first enlistment and who afterwards came into the Army and served as commissioned officers.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GEORGE STOLL AND OTHERS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 1430) for the relief of George Stoll and the heirs of Charles P. Regan, Marshall Turley, Edward Lannigan, James Manley, and John Hunter.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It appropriates $6,545, in full payment for property condemned and appropriated by the Government of the United States on the Fort Bridger Military Reservation, to be paid to the following named and described persons and parties and in the following amounts, as assessed by a board lawfully convened for that purpose, to wit: To George Stoll and the heirs of Charles P. Regan and the heirs of Marshall Turley, $3,845; to Edward Lannigan, $800; to the heirs of James Manley, $1,500; to the heirs of John Hunter, $400.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPETENCY OF WITNESSES.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7065) to amend section 858 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 858 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

SEC. 858. The competency of a witness to testify in any civil action, suit, or proceeding in the courts of the United States, shall be determined by the laws of the State or Territory in which the court is held.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WORKS OF RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20266) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the condemnation of lands or easements needed in connection with works of river and harbor improvement at the expense of persons, companies, or corporations," approved May 16, 1906, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. MALLORY, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. GALLINGER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PROPOSED PRINTING OF STATEHOOD ACT.

Mr. CARTER. I move that 25,000 copies of that portion of the statehood act relating to Oklahoma be printed and placed at the disposal of the governor of Oklahoma, and that 20,000 copies of the same act in so far as it relates to Arizona and New Mexico be printed and placed in equal proportions at the disposal of the governors of the respective Territories.

Mr. KEAN and Mr. LODGE. That ought to be done by a joint resolution.

Mr. CARTER. I desire to state that the request as it originally came to me would have placed it under the rule, but by an estimate made this order can be made without a resolution or without reference to a committee.

Mr. LODGE. Why should that come out of the contingent fund of the Senate?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator had better do that by resolution.

Mr. CARTER. If there is objection to the course I have proposed, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 25, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SATURDAY, June 23, 1906.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DEPUTY COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged bill, H. R. 19749, to prescribe the duties of deputy collectors of customs.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a deputy collector of customs and other customs officers at ports and subports of entry in the several customs collection districts, and deputy collectors thus appointed shall have authority to receive entries, collect duties, and to perform any and all functions prescribed by law for collectors of customs, subject to such regulations and restrictions as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided, That whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint a deputy collector at a port of entry where there is no collector, he shall designate the collector through whom such deputy shall report, but the bond of such deputy shall run to the Government and the deputy shall be financially responsible directly to the Government.

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, this is the unanimous report of the Ways and Means Committee. The bill was drawn by the Treasury Department. As I understand it, there will be no opposition on the part of anybody. The purpose of the bill is to give the deputy collectors at subports of entry all the privileges of a collector at ports of entry in order to save the captains of vessels from being obliged to go from the subports to the ports of entry.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is not the administrative customs bill?

Mr. HILL of Connecticut. Oh, no; this is a bill with which the gentleman is perfectly familiar.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE—COUDREY V. WOOD.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Elections Committee No. 2, I present the following report and resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Ernest E. Wood was not elected to membership in the House of Representatives of the United States in the Fifty-ninth Congress, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Harry M. Coudrey was elected to membership in the House of Representatives of the United States in the Fifty-ninth Congress, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I think there is no opposition to the resolution.

Mr. TALBOTT. There is no minority report, and under the conditions there was nothing else for the committee to do.

The resolutions were agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bills of the following titles:

CONTESTED ELECTION CASE, HOUSTON V. BROOCKS.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 3 I submit the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That A. J. Houston was not elected a Member of the Fifty-ninth Congress from the Second Congressional district of Texas, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the views of Mr. BANNON, a member of the committee be printed with the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the views of Mr. BANNON, a member of the committee, be printed with the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls up the conference report on the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

On amendment No. 248: Appropriates $5,400, as proposed by the House, instead of $6,000, as proposed by the Senate, for St. Ann's Infant Asylum.

On amendments Nos. 249, 250, and 251, relating to the municipal lodging house: Appropriates $1,200, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1,000, as proposed by the House, for salary of the superintendent; and strikes out provision for a clerk at $720, as proposed by the Senate.

On amendments Nos. 252, 253, 254, and 255, relating to the Temporary Home for ex-Union Soldiers and Sailors: Appropriates $1,200, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $1,000, as proposed by the House, for salary of the superintendent, and $3,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $3,700, as proposed by the House, for maintenance; and makes a verbal correction in the text of the bill in the paragraph relating to the Hospital for the Insane.

On amendments Nos. 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, and 261, relating to the militia: Appropriates $1,500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $400, as proposed by the House, for lockers and furniture for armories; increases the compensation of the custodian in charge of property and storerooms, as proposed by the Senate, from $900 to $1,000; appropriates $15,000, as proposed by the House, instead of $17,000 as proposed by the Senate, for expenses of camps, instruction, practice marches and practice cruises, and provides that $3,000 of the sum appropriated for these objects for 1906 shall be available for rifle practice and repair of practice ships for that year; appropriates $500, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $300, as proposed by the House, for general incidental expenses; and strikes out the appropriation of $6,300 proposed by the Senate for a building for use of the Naval Battalion.

On amendment No. 262: Appropriates $100,000, as proposed by the Senate, for water meters.

On amendments Nos. 263, 264, 265, and 266, relating to the water department: Appropriates for an additional clerk at $1,000, as proposed by the Senate, in the revenue and inspection branch, and inserts the provision, as proposed by the Senate, for the payment to the Holly Manufacturing Company of the sum of $6,880.

On amendment No. 267: Fixes the amount that may be expended for certain personal services out of appropriations for public works in the District at $60,000, as proposed by the Senate, instead of $50,000, as proposed by the House.

On amendments Nos. 268 and 269: Inserts as a separate section the provision proposed by the Senate, authorizing for the fiscal year 1907 advances out of the Treasury to meet any deficit that may occur in the revenues of the District of Columbia during that year and makes correction in the number of a section.

F. H. GILLETT,
WASHINGTON GARDNER,
A. S. BURLESON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, this is the unanimous report of the conference committee, and while the bill is not in many respects as we would like to have it, we think it is fairly satisfactory. I move the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield to me for a moment, until I put a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I have this morning furnished me, at my own request, by my friend, Mr. H. W. Taft, a copy of the indictment found a few days ago by the Federal grand jury in New York against McAdams & Forbes Company, of New York, a branch of the tobacco trust. It is a new proceeding, based in the main on new laws, and very valuable for the House and the country to read. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a copy of the indictment in the case of the United States of America against the McAdams & Forbes Company, of New York. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I am very much surprised at the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

Mr. Coudrey appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office prescribed by law.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the Senate amendments thereto, and to ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the sundry civil appropriation bill, to nonconcur in the Senate amendments, and to ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. TAWNEY, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, and Mr. TAYLOR of Alabama.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed the sundry civil bill with the Senate amendments numbered.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the post-office appropriation bill, and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana calls up the conference report on the post-office appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16953) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 13, 27, 28, 39, 40, 41, 49, 50, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 67, 68, 70, 71, 72, 73, 76, 77, 79, and 80.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 11, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 66, 69, 74, 75, and 82; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 9: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "thirty-five" and insert the word "seventy-two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out "five hundred and fifty-four thousand seven hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred and ninety-nine thousand one hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment fo the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ninety-four" and insert the words "one hundred and forty-seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "one hundred and five" and insert the word "ninety-five;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 16: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 16, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "six;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 42: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 42, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "three hundred and seventy" and insert the words "two hundred and fifty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 43: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 43, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "eight hundred and thirty" and insert the words "eight hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That the Postmaster-General shall require all railroads carrying the mails under contract to comply with the terms of said contract as to time of arrival and departure of said mails, and it shall be his duty to impose and collect reasonable fines for delay when such delay is not caused by unavoidable accidents or conditions."

Amendment numbered 51: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 51, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"For pay of freight or expressage on postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. And the Postmaster-General shall require, when in freightable lots and whenever practicable, the withdrawal from the mails of all postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, in the respective weighing divisions of the country immediately preceding the weighing period in said divisions, and such postal cards, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, empty mail bags, furniture, equipment, and other supplies for the postal service, except postage stamps, shall be transmitted by either freight or express;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 63: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 63, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "thirty thousand" and insert the words "twenty-seven thousand five hundred;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 64: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 64, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "thirty-two thousand five hundred" and insert the words "thirty thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 65: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 65, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words "seven hundred and ninety-three thousand six hundred" and insert the words "eight hundred and seventy thousand;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 78: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 78, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out of the amendment "exclusive of holidays and Sundays," and substitute for the proviso the following: "That in the discretion of the Postmaster-General the pay of any rural carrier on a water route who furnishes his own power boat and is employed during the summer months, may be fixed at an amount not exceeding seven hundred and twenty dollars in any one calendar year;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 81: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 81, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by said amendment insert the following: "That hereafter no article, package, or other matter, except postage stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, and internal-revenue stamps, shall be admitted to the mails under a penalty privilege, unless such article, package, or other matter, except postage stamps, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, postal cards, and internal-revenue stamps, would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 83: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 83, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "Committee" wherever it appears and insert in lieu thereof the word "Commission," and add at the end of said amendment the words "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid out on the order of the chairman of the Joint Commission;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on the part of the House.

BOIES PENROSE,
A. S. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House of the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 16953) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon in the accompanying conference report on each of the Senate amendments, namely:

The Senate made eighty-three amendments to the bill, involving an increase of $998,330.

By the action of the conferees, submitted in the accompanying report, the House recedes upon amendments involving an increase of $208,430. The Senate receded on amendments involving $789,900.

The bill as passed by the House carried $191,487,568.75.

As agreed to by the conferees the bill carries $191,695,998.75.

Amendment No. 1: This amendment reduces the appropriation for advertising purposes by $1,500.

Amendment No. 2: This amendment authorized three experienced postal officials to investigate postal conditions, and was disagreed to.

Amendments Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12: These amendments refer to the post-office inspection service, and the effect is to authorize the increase of salaries of a portion of the inspectors and rural agents by the terms of the amendment transferred or merged into the post-office inspection service.

Amendment No. 13: This amendment restores the appropriation for per diem allowance of inspectors to the amount carried by the House bill.

Amendment No. 14: This amendment increases the appropriation for compensation of clerks and laborers at division headquarters $5,000 over the amount carried by the House bill.

Amendment No. 15: This amendment merely changes the phraseology.

Amendment No. 16: This amendment increases the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses at division headquarters by $1,000.

Amendments Nos. 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 22: These amendments result in the promotion of four superintendents from salaries of $3,000 each to salaries of $3,200 each.

Amendments Nos. 23, 24, and 25: These amendments permit two private secretaries to postmasters at salaries of $2,400 each instead of one at that salary and one at $1,700.

Amendment No. 26: This amendment grants discretion to the Postmaster-General in assignment of compensation of employees in offices of the first and second classes in accordance with the amount of business transacted in such offices.

Amendment No. 27: This amendment granted leave of absence to clerks in offices of the first and second classes, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, and was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 28: This amendment restores to the House bill authority for expenditure for temporary clerk hire at summer and winter resorts.

Amendment No. 29: This amendment increases by $25,000 the appropriation for necessary and miscellaneous items connected with first and second class post-offices.

Amendments Nos. 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34: These amendments result in authorizing three additional superintendents of the salary and allowance division with the same grade of pay and per diem as those now employed.

Amendment No. 35: This amendment reduces by $25,000 the appropriation for letter carriers and substitutes at offices entitled under existing law to city-delivery service.

Amendments Nos. 36, 37, and 38: These simply change the phraseology relative to incidental expenses in the city-delivery service.

Amendments Nos. 39, 40, and 41: These amendments restore the provision of the House bill relative to travel and miscellaneous expenses in the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General.

Amendment No. 42: This amendment increases the appropriation carried by the House bill for inland transportation by star routes by $150,000.

Amendment No. 43: This amendment increases the appropriation for inland transportation by steamboats and other power boats $25,000.

Amendments Nos. 44, 45, and 46: These amendments result in authorizing pneumatic-tube service at the cities of San Francisco and Baltimore in addition to the authorization in the House bill, and increase the authority for annual pay by $88,734.16, and permit contracts for such service for a period of ten years.

Amendments Nos. 47 and 48: These amendments authorize an additional $5,000 expenditure for rent of mail-bag repair shop and expenses incident thereto.

Amendment No. 49: This amendment authorized a lease for ten years for buildings for postal supplies and also for mail-bag repair shop at an annual rental of not exceeding $35,000. This amendment was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 50: So far as this amendment referred to the weighing of the mails in the western division incident to the earthquake in California on April 18, 1906, it was disagreed to. That portion of the amendment relative to authority for the Postmaster-General to require railroads to maintain the terms of their contracts relative to the time of arrival and departure of mails was agreed to with an amendment.

Amendment No. 51: This amendment relates to the withdrawal from the mails at periods near the weighing periods of the general supplies of the postal service and was agreed to with a change of phraseology.

Amendments Nos. 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, and 62: These amendments, relative to the appropriation for railway postal cars and railway mail service, were disagreed to.

Amendments Nos. 63 and 64: These amendments, relating to per diem allowance for assistant superintendents of the railway mail service, were so modified as to make a change of $2,500 on the total allowance.

Amendment No. 65: This amendment relates to appropriation for inland transportation by electric and cable-car service and was modified so as to provide $70,000 less than the appropriation carried by the House bill.

Amendment No. 66: This changes the proviso in the expenditure of the money for special facilities on the trunk lines from Washington to Atlanta and New Orleans, and was agreed to.

Amendment No. 67: This amendment, authorizing payment of indemnity for loss of registered articles in the international mails, was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 68: This amendment results in an increase of $100,000 for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps.

Amendments Nos. 69 and 70: These amendments were so modified as to prohibit the contract for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps with any department or bureau of the Government below the cost of such work to the Government.

Amendments Nos. 71 and 72: These amendments, relative to the manufacture of stamped envelopes and postal cards, restore the amounts authorized by the House bill.

Amendment No. 73: This amendment restores the amount for travel and miscellaneous expenses in the office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General to the amount authorized by the House bill.

Amendment No. 74: This increases by $10,000 the appropriation for stationery, including money-order offices.

Amendment No. 75: This amendment increases by $25,000 the appropriation for wrapping twine and tying devices.

Amendment No. 76: This authorized $500,000 additional for rural delivery service, and was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 77: This amendment authorized the collection of addresses by postmasters and rural carriers, and was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 78: The amendment relates to the authorization of fifteen days' annual leave to rural carriers with pay, and was agreed to with an amendment placing such leave of absence on the same basis now enjoyed by city carriers. The proviso in amendment No. 78, relative to pay of rural carriers on water routes, was agreed to with an amendment.

Amendment No. 79: This amendment gave permission to patrons on rural routes to use any kind of a box, and it was disagreed to.

Amendment No. 80: This amendment restores the appropriation carried by the House bill.

Amendment No. 81: This amendment relating to the admission to the mails under penalty privilege was disagreed to and in amended form accepted. The amendment as agreed to prevents the admission to the mails under penalty privilege of articles and packages, except stamped paper, unless such articles and packages would be entitled to admission to the mails under laws requiring payment of postage.

Amendment No. 82: This amendment provided that the provision did not apply to any committee composed of Members of Congress, and was agreed to.

Amendment No. 83: This amendment authorizes the appointment of a joint commission of Congress, consisting of three Senators and three Members of the House, to investigate and report relative to second-class mail matter. This amendment was agreed to with some amendments changing the phraseology.

JESSE OVERSTREET,
J. J. GARDNER,
JOHN A. MOON,
Managers on part of the House.

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to call the attention of the House to a slight and unimportant error as it appeared in the printed copy of the report, both in the RECORD of the House at the time the report was submitted to the House and in the RECORD when the report was submitted to the Senate. The error was that the amendment No. 50 was noted as one of the several amendments from which the Senate had receded, when, as a matter of fact, that amendment was agreed to with an amendment. The original report submitted to both Houses and the Journal of both Houses were correct. I move the adoption of the report.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that the conferees have rejected the Senate amendment permitting patrons on rural mail routes to use boxes of wood or metal of their own make without being approved by the Post-Office Department. That amendment could have been so changed by the committee of conference as to have conformed to the bill I introduced by giving the Department the power to regulate by prescribing such general rules and regulations as might be necessary to protect the mail and make it convenient for the carrier. I have not lost hope of getting favorable action on my bill; if not during this session I think by the time the next session of this Congress convenes the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will have heard enough from their constituents to take fright and get busy.

Mr. Chairman, I am getting letters almost without number indorsing my bill and urging me to push it. They are all so nearly alike that to read one is to read all. I will not take up the time of the House reading those letters, nor will I even ask permission to insert them in the RECORD, but I will take the time of the House to read one letter, as it is from the State of the present Postmaster-General, and I very much desire that Mr. Cortelyou know what the people of his own State think of my bill. I am afraid our eminent Postmaster-General is relying altogether upon the suggestions and advice of the subordinates in his great Department and is not giving sufficient heed to the good hard, practical common sense of the farmers of the country.

The letter is as follows:

CHAUTAUQUA COUNTY POMONA GRANGE,
Jamestown, N. Y., June 16, 1906.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: Chautauqua County (N. Y.) Pomona Grange in session assembled June 15, 1906, unanimously indorsed the bill introduced by you April 30, which if passed would allow patrons of rural mail routes to put up such boxes as they see fit, and without the approval of the Post-Office Department. We believe it to be an injustice to the patrons of rural routes to require them to put up an "approved" box. We trust the bill you introduced may become a law. Chautauqua County Pomona Grange represents a membership of nearly 6,000 Patrons of Husbandry.

I received your speech of April 28 and 30. Thanks for the same.

Respectfully, yours,

A. A. VAN VLECK, Secretary.

This letter is of a kind that burdens my mail. You must remember that the farmers who are the patrons of these rural routes are not the kind of people who rush into print with their complaints, but who vote as they complain. Mr. Chairman, it is a remarkable view to take that the farmers are so intelligent and so well educated that we must, at the cost of many millions of dollars, supply them with daily mail and yet they are so simple and so disregardful of their own interests that a few clerks and subordinate Department officials must prescribe what kind of boxes these same farmers must use in which to receive their mail.

I now read a letter from the Postmaster-General, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 18, 1906.

SIR: In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 9, 1906 (p. 8835), referring to the statement made by the Department as to the unfit receptacles erected by patrons to be used as mail boxes on rural delivery routes prior to the issuance of regulations requiring the use of approved boxes, you are quoted as saying:

"I ask the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General to specify and let us know where the people live, whether North, East, West, or South, that are guilty of what is here openly charged."

In that connection I have the honor to state that the conditions referred to existed to a very large extent prior to August 1, 1901, and as a matter of fact exist in isolated cases to-day. It would be difficult to furnish a complete report regarding the box conditions prior to the date mentioned, because of the fact that the records of the earlier years of the rural service are stored in another building and it would require much time and labor to search through them. The following, however, are a few of the cases disclosed by an examination of the files of this office:

"At Big Sandy, Tenn., a large list of patrons maintaining poor wooden boxes was reported, with statement from the postmaster, dated October 31, 1905, that all the wooden boxes in use on the four routes from that office were poor, being such boxes as the patrons could pick up, and none of them safe or waterproof.

"At Ashland City, Tenn., quite a number of nonweatherproof wooden boxes are reported in use, one on route No. 2 being a cigar box.

"At Albany, Oreg., among a large number of nonapproved boxes, is reported one oil can on route No. 1; one stovepipe and one oil can on route No. 3.

"At Minooka, Ill., is reported one wooden tobacco box on route No. 1, and on route No. 4, one box, wood and tin, made from stovepipe.

"At Washington, Pa., route No. 4, a stovepipe; route No. 7, a basket; route No. 10, a tin can.

"At Union City, Tenn., route No. 1, a stovepipe, and on several rural routes from that office large number of wooden boxes in bad condition.

"Under date of April 29, 1902, the postmaster at Meadville, Pa., reporting on the condition of boxes on thirteen rural routes from that office, states that out of 1,600 patrons all but 100 have erected approved boxes, the remainder having wooden boxes of all qualities, including soap and cigar boxes."

In regard to the boxes in use on rural routes in the Eighth Congressional district of Tennessee, it should be stated that the percentage of condemned boxes in this district is quite low, which is undoubtedly due to the fact that most of the service in that district has been installed since the promulgation of the order of the Postmaster-General, effective October 1, 1902, requiring patrons of rural delivery to provide themselves with approved boxes. The office of Big Sandy, Benton County, Tenn., to which reference is made above, is in the Eighth district of Tennessee.

It should be added that there are no objections on the part of the Post-Office Department to patrons of rural delivery having boxes made to order, as under existing regulations an individual may have his box made to order, provided it conforms to the specifications, and in order to facilitate approval of such boxes for the rural delivery service the Postmaster-General has for some weeks been considering a proposition which contemplates a modification of existing regulations, so that in such case a patron may readily secure the approval of a box manufactured to order by submitting it to the postmaster at the post-office located at the county seat, who, if he finds that the box conforms to the regulations, may certify the same to the Department and authorize the owner to indicate thereon that it is "approved by the Postmaster-General."

Very respectfully,

GEO. B. CORTELYOU,
Postmaster-General.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I have the honor to represent the Eighth district of Tennessee, referred to in the letter just read. In the speech referred to I had denied that the conditions referred to in a former statement from the Post-Office Department, then read by me, existed in my district. I said further that even the negroes of my district had more pride than to be guilty of what was charged as to the character of boxes in use. No doubt the clerks of the Department made a careful examination as to my district, and the above report from the postmaster at Big Sandy, a town in my district, was all that could be found. I have traveled all over my district in a vehicle, and at no place have I ever seen a wooden rural box in use, while such boxes are in use on star routes and are giving as good satisfaction as the metal boxes for which our friends in the Post-Office Department seem to have an almost fanatical fondness.

After receiving the letter just read from the honorable Postmaster-General I wrote to the honorable Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General, asking when the rural routes from Big Sandy, Tenn., were established, and received the following reply:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, June 22, 1906.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: Replying to your letter of June 19, you will find below the dates upon which the rural routes from Big Sandy, Benton County, Tenn., were established:

Route No. 1, established November 2, 1903.
Route No. 2, established November 2, 1903.
Route No. 3, established November 2, 1903.
Route No. 4, established September 1, 1904.

Very respectfully,

P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

It will be seen that three of the routes at Big Sandy were established November 2, 1903, and one September 1, 1904—three of them almost at the close of 1903 and one in latter part of 1904. At those dates wooden boxes were not permitted to be used on rural routes, and rural carriers at those dates were not permitted to put mail in wooden boxes. Notwithstanding, as appears from the letter of the Postmaster-General just read, "At Big Sandy, Tenn., a large list of patrons maintaining poor wooden boxes was reported, with statement from the postmaster, dated October 31, 1905, that all the wooden boxes in use on the four routes from that office were poor, being such boxes as the patrons could pick up, and none of them safe or waterproof." If those routes had beeen established before the Post-Office Department had made an order that none but approved boxes be used it would seem reasonable that the statement might be correct, but as none of these routes were established until November 1, 1903, more than a year after the order of the Postmaster-General of October 1, 1902, requiring all patrons of rural routes to provide themselves with approved boxes, I do not hesitate to say that I do not believe the report. I challenge its truth upon what appears to me to be good and sufficient grounds, and demand an investigation; and if the report is false—as I believe it is—I demand that the postmaster, inspector, or whoever made it be discharged from the public service.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether it is known to the Postmaster-General or not, but it is a fact, that at least some of the inspectors and special agents sent out to look over these rural routes seem to be imbued with a spirit of enmity to the rural service; that they have almost a supreme contempt for poor people who reside in dwellings not altogether as good as these gentlemen would have them. They act in a way to magnify their self-assumed authority. They often make very unbecoming remarks about the roads and the people. These lofty gentlemen do not have to travel the roads often, and if the carriers are willing, for the salary they receive, to perform their duties and travel the roads as they find them, and deliver the mails on schedule time, I can not see why these Department officials want to deprive these good people of this service, who pay the taxes and who, of all people, stand most in need of free rural mail delivery.

I find that these inspectors often use the most unbecoming language and make all sorts of threats as to what they will do with the service if their views are not adopted by the patrons. I often find that both patrons and carriers are afraid to make reports of this bad conduct for fear the routes will be discontinued. I often get letters from people I know, that are reputable and truthful, telling of these things, but always say to keep the matter quiet, and ask me to do what I can to retain the routes in service. I am in receipt of such a letter of the 19th of this month, and will read it, leaving out names of persons and places:

———, TENN., June 19, 1906.

Hon. T. W. SIMS, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SIMS: We have had with us a Mr. ———, route inspector, who has heretofore been connected with the Chicago territory.

He stated to my patrons that they would not be served unless they provided approved boxes, and so advised me. He also said that he guessed he would discontinue the service. Patrons do not wish to be at the expense of buying boxes and then lose the service, so they do not know what to do. The said Mr. ——— was very disrespectful of the South. He said that colored ladies were just as worthy a smile and tip of the hat as white ones, and insisted that carriers show them that respect. He was very disagreeable to ride with. We shall be glad if you will send us a true gentleman to inspect our routes, and then we will be contented with his disposition of same.

Very respectfully,

——— ———, R. M. C.

P. S.—Please keep my name confidential.

This letter is from a carrier on a rural route in my district. He is a truthful man, but he is afraid if his name be given he will lose his place. I have often received letters like this, but of course never filed them, as the writers were afraid they might lose the service altogether. I am going to insist on the gentleman who wrote the letter just read to permit me to give his name and that of the inspector to the Postmaster-General. I do not believe for a moment that any such conduct would be upheld by the postal authorities. I think he would be promptly removed from the public service, as he ought to be. What right has a postal official from the North or elsewhere to go down South on official duties and instead of attending to such duties to engage in a lecture to a rural carrier on his social duties and attentions to negro women—advising and directing an educated and gentlemanly white man carrying the mails to tip his hat and smile to "colored ladies." No wonder that such a man as this finds fault with the rural service, complains of the roads and lack of boxes. He is so enraged because the rural carrier with whom he had the honor to ride was not tipping his hat and smiling at all the negro women he chanced to meet that he threatened to discontinue the service.

Mr. Chairman, if patrons were permitted to put up boxes of either wood or metal, subject to such rules and regulations as the Department may prescribe as to size, convenience to road, weatherproof, etc., we will be rid of the expense of paying a lot of self-opinionated, stuck-up inspectors for going over the country putting in their time smiling and tipping their hats at negro women and teaching rural carriers to do the same. The carriers, being sworn officials of the Post-Office Department, can report either to the Post-Office Department direct or to the postmaster at the emanating office as to whether or not patrons are complying with the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, and do it just as well as a high-salaried inspector, and save all the expense of the travel of the inspector, and thus reducing the number of inspectors.

If we keep on as we have been going in the last few years we will have more inspectors of one kind or another than we have men in the Regular Army and costing as much or more money to maintain them. I think it is time to get rid of some of this army of useless inspectors, and by permitting patrons of rural routes to put up just such boxes of either wood or metal as serves the purpose for which they are used, subject to the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, and all inspection of same to be made by the carriers on the routes without additional compensation, we will get rid of the expense of maintaining a great number of inspectors now being used in this way, and so far as results go we will be just as well off, if not better.

From the letter of the Postmaster-General read at the beginning of my remarks it appears that he is now considering a change in existing regulations so as to permit patrons to put up boxes to order by having them approved by the postmaster at the county seat. This is a step in the right direction, but I hope he will abandon the idea of requiring approval by the postmaster at the county seat. If it is thought necessary to have the approval of a postmaster, why not let the postmaster at each emanating office approve the boxes for the routes from that office? My plan is to have the carriers on each route approve, or rather disapprove. I would have the carrier report on cases where the regulations were not complied with only, going on the presumption that patrons will comply with the regulations and reporting only those who do not, either to the postmaster at the emanating office or to the Department. If all the routes in a county started from the county seat, then it would be practical and convenient to have the boxes approved by the postmaster at the county seat. But in fact many more routes emanate from offices other than the county seat than do from the county seat. In many cases patrons would have to carry their boxes 20 miles in order to have them approved by the postmaster at the county seat. This seems to me to be an unnecessary and unwarranted inconvenience to the patron.

We had just as well go to the most practical common-sense methods at once, as we will in the end do this very thing. The so-called "common people" have an idea that they know a few things themselves, and they will not readily submit to the long-continued use of red-tape circumlocution office methods. I hope the Postmaster-General will not draw the line on the use of good, well-constructed wooden boxes when he makes his contemplated change in existing regulations. In my district there is an abundance of good, cheap lumber, and it is both cheaper and more convenient to use wood than metal. In my State a good wooden shingle roof will last eight or ten years, often much longer, without paint or repair. They in fact last much longer and require painting much less than any kind of a metal roof. The same will be true as to good wooden mail boxes. They will last much longer and be just as good and weatherproof as metal boxes and can be manufactured much cheaper. Then why require patrons to use metal? There are no real valid reasons why wood should not be used, and others can only be surmised.

Mr. Chairman, wood was used ages before metal by primitive man. The human race as well as the animals of earth and fowls of the air were saved from utter extinction by a wooden box. This box was water and weather proof, as shown by its remaining in perfect condition and afloat during the longest spell of rainy weather and highest waters ever known, according to sacred history. The Son of God was born in a wooden house, laid in a wooden receptacle, and died on a wooden cross; and yet it is claimed by the Post-Office Department that a wooden rural mail box is not good enough for a simple American citizen to use as a receptacle in which to receive a postal card or a county newspaper.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question. Is there any provision in this bill permitting the transmission of silver and other coins, of bonds, etc., as provided in the bill reported yesterday by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] so as to relieve the Treasury of the expense of the express charges which are so oppressive?

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no reference to that in this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman has not introduced or reported any such bill.

Mr. OVERSTREET. There is no such bill before the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. I move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

OSAGE INDIANS IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Osage allotment bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up a conference report on the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 15373. An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15333) entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 11 and 24.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37; and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the words inserted by the Senate, restore the matter stricken out, and insert, after "members," "subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 12: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 12, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Following the word "Oklahoma," in said amendment, insert: "Provided, That the surplus lands shall be nontaxable for the period of three years from the approval of this act, except where certificates of competency are issued or in case of the death of the allottee, unless otherwise provided by Congress; and;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 13: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ten" and insert "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the word "ten" and insert "forty;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 18: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 18, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the Senate amendment insert: "And provided further, That no mining of or prospecting for any of said mineral or minerals shall be permitted on the homestead selections herein provided for without the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting any valid existing lease or contract;" and the Senate agree to the same.

CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

CHESTER I. LONG,
WM. J. STONE,
MOSES E. CLAPP,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

Statement of the managers on the part of the House on the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15333) entitled "An act for the division of the lands and funds of the Osage Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes."

The House recedes from its disagreements to amendments 1, 2, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37.

The Senate recedes from its amendments Nos. 11 and 24.

The House agrees to the Senate amendments Nos. 3, 12, 13, 14, and 18, with amendments.

Amendment No. 1 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to pass upon applications for enrollment which are pending at the date of the approval of this act.

Amendment No. 2 strikes out the provision in reference to the list of names, which is fully provided for in another part of the bill.

Amendment No. 3 provides for the allotment of lands to those who fail to make their own selections by the United States Indian agent, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 4 is substantially the same in reference to lands selected by minors.

Amendments Nos. 5, 6, 11, and 12 are in reference to the taxation of the surplus lands of the Osage Indians. The amendments as finally agreed upon by the conference committee provide that the surplus lands shall be exempt from taxation for a period of three years except where certificates of competency are issued or in case of the death of the allottee and unless otherwise provided by Congress. Your managers thought this was the best disposition to make of the amendment of the Senate.

Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 change the manner of making the appointment of the commission which is to supervise the selection and the division of the lands. As amended, the tribe is given one member of the commission, while the other two are to be appointed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 10 is a change of phraseology.

Amendments Nos. 13 and 14 change the amount of land which certain persons owning improvements are permitted to buy from 10 to 40 acres.

Amendment No. 15 requires the appraisement of the townsite commission to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 16 limits the House provision which continued the provisions of the appropriation act for the year 1906 to the pages of said act which apply to the Osage Reservation.

Amendment No. 17 is a change of phraseology.

Amendment No. 18 prohibits any mining or prospecting for minerals upon the homestead of any of the Indians without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, but provision is made that nothing in said item shall be construed as affecting any valid or existing lease or contract.

Amendment No. 19 is a change of phraseology.

Amendment No. 20 strikes out section 5, which is made unnecessary by an amendment which was agreed to when the bill passed the House, but by oversight section 5 was retained in the bill.

Amendments Nos. 21, 23, 25, 28, 30, 34, 35, and 36 simply changes the numbering of the sections.

Amendment No. 22 is a change of phraseology.

Amendment No. 26 gives the right to parties to whom lands are set aside for their sole use and benefit, not only to control the lands, but also the proceeds thereof.

Amendment No. 27 provides that leases given on lands for the benefit of individual members of the tribe shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Amendment No. 29 strikes out the section creating a county out of the Osage Indian Reservation, as this has been already provided for in the statehood bill.

Amendment No. 31 makes it unnecessary for a new election to be held this year. As the tribe has just had an election, it was thought to be unnecessary to require another before 1908.

Amendment No. 32 is made necessary by amendment 31, and changes the word "six" to "eight."

Amendment No. 33 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to remove any member of the council for good cause.

Amendment No. 37 strikes out section 15, which provided for the ratification of the act by a vote of the members of the tribe. This was deemed unnecessary, as the tribe has already virtually voted upon the act, and it has been an issue among the members for a number of years, and at the election in 1905 the tribe was almost unanimous for the measure.

Your managers recommend the adoption of the report.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to agree to the conference report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

LANDS OF THE MENOMINEE INDIANS, WISCONSIN.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the Menominee Indian bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the conference report on the bill indicated, and asks unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13372) to authorize the sale of timber on certain of the lands reserved for the use of the Menominee tribe of Indians, in the State of Wisconsin, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the forty-eighth line strike out "five" and insert "four;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHARLES CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
ROBERT J. GAMBLE,
WM. J. STONE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The Senate struck out all of said bill after the enacting clause and inserted in lieu thereof a provision in reference to the sale and disposition of the dead and down timber upon the territory named in the bill, the Senate's provision being that this cutting should be done through the instrumentality of the business men's committee of the Menominee tribe, and the sales should be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. The money necessary for carrying on the cutting, measuring, and disposal of the timber was paid for out of the Menominee fund in the Treasury, the sale to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds to be used first to reimburse the Menominee fund in the Treasury and thereafter one-fifth of the net proceeds to be disbursed by the Secretary for the benefit of the Indians, and the other four-fifths to be deposited in the Treasury for the benefit of said Indians and to draw 5 per cent interest.

The House agrees in this amendment amended so as to provide that the fund deposited in the Treasury should draw 4 per cent interest rather than 5.

J. S. SHERMAN,
CHAS. CURTIS,
WM. T. ZENOR,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the report.

The question was taken; and the conference report was adopted.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the vote was laid on the table.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The SPEAKER. Under the special order the House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pure-food bill, and the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. CURRIER] will take the chair.

Mr. CURRIER took the chair.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 16, line 5, by striking out the word "all" and inserting in lieu thereof "any of."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is offered at the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] to correct what might be an ambiguity in the text. I ask for a vote.

Mr. KEIFER. Do I understand the gentleman has concluded offering amendments at the instance of the committee?

Mr. MANN. Well, I have another amendment to offer at the instance of the committee, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KEIFER. I just wanted to be sure about that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 27 by adding at the end of section 15: "The word 'person' as used in this act, shall be construed to import both the plural and the singular, as the case demands, and shall include corporations, companies, societies, and associations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act the act, omission, or failure of any officer, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any corporation, company, society, or association within the scope of his employment or office shall in every case be also deemed to be the act, omission, or failure of such corporation, company, society, or association, as well as that of the person."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment simply defines the word "person" in the act, so as to include corporations, companies, associations, etc., and also that the officer, agent, or other person acting for the corporation shall be guilty within the scope of his employment as well as the corporation itself.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman to inform me what part of the bill this amendment proposes to amend?

Mr. MANN. This is to amend at the end of section 17; to insert at the end of section 15, page 27.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask to have the amendment read again?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just offered an amendment which proposes to extend the scope of this bill in the way of creating additional objects for criminal prosecution in the Federal courts. While very innocent looking, this amendment will furnish full opportunity for the hundreds of inspectors and spies that are to be employed under this act to harass, annoy, and persecute the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment, because it is an effort on the part of the General Government to undertake to enforce police laws, a power which the General Government does not possess except in the District of Columbia and the Territories; and in those portions of the territory of the United States over which the States have exclusive jurisdiction the United States has no police power to be exercised in the States. Of course, what I say in reference to that may with equal force be applied to the main provisions of this bill, and, in fact, might be applied to the entire bill, except that part of the bill which proposes to make crimes and offenses in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

Congress has no power or authority to seek to enforce police regulations within the States; the duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of equality of rights; to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in the conservation of public health, good order, and prosperity was originally assumed by the States, and it remains there; it always belongs to the States; this power of the States was not surrendered to the General Government, and is essentially exclusive in the States.

The views of the minority of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of this House were presented by myself on March 14 last, and have been printed in the RECORD of yesterday. In those views I have collected and cited the numerous decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and quoted in full from those which fully sustain the propositions I have stated. This bill, as it comes from the committee, is based upon the idea that because the police laws of the States may not be satisfactory, or because they may not be forced to the satisfaction of all, therefore the Congress of the United States should invade the States and do that which, up to this hour, it has never been able to do—enact laws to prevent frauds, impositions, and adulterations of foods in the States; a power which Congress does not possess, never possessed, and one that this act will prove futile to establish. This duty belongs exclusively to the States, and from the evidence produced before our committee the States are performing this duty efficiently, and those who chiefly seek this legislation are the food manufacturers who have been compelled to obey the State laws on the subject of pure food. These manufacturers clamor for a national law which shall be "uniform," and which will permit them to override and annul the various State laws on this subject. I do not believe that Congress can so legislate as to prevent the States from protecting the people of the States from frauds or imposition in the matter of foods, and being of that opinion I can not support this bill.

That I may not be regarded as having made a statement which is unsupported by authority, I will call attention to some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

In the case of The Mayor and Aldermen of New York v. Miln (11 Peters, U. S. R.) the Supreme Court of the United States declare in no uncertain terms what the powers of the States are in reference to the subjects embraced in this bill, and used the following language:

A State has the same undeniable and unlimited jurisdiction over all persons and things within its territorial limits as any foreign nation, when that jurisdiction is not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

It is not only the right but the bounden and solemn duty of a State to advance the safety, happiness, and prosperity of its people and to provide for its general welfare by any and every act of legislation which it may deem conducive to these ends when the powers over the particular subject or the manner of its exercise are not surrendered or restrained by the Constitution of the United States.

All those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or which may be more properly called internal police, are not surrendered or restrained, and consequently in relation to these the authority of the State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive.

In the opinion rendered by Judge Barbour the statement is made that these positions are considered "as impregnable." In defining what is meant by the "police powers" of the State the court said:

Every law came within this description which concerned the welfare of the whole people of a State or any individual within it, whether it related to their rights or duties; whether it respected them as men, or as citizens of the State; whether in their public or private relations; whether it related to the rights of persons or of property of the whole people of a State or of any individual within it, and whose operation was within the territorial limits of the State, and upon the persons and things within its jurisdiction. * * *

In the case of United States v. De Witt, 9 Wallace U. S., pp. 41–45, the Supreme Court, in an opinion rendered by Chief Justice Chase, said:

As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes, territorially, all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia. Within State limits it can have no constitutional operation. This has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions (License cases, 5 How., 504; Passenger cases, 7 How., 283; License Tax cases, 5 Wall., 470—72 U. S., XVIII, 500—and the cases cited), that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion.

But it is claimed that the Congress has the power to enact this legislation under the "commerce clause" of the Constitution. The Congress does not derive any power to enact police laws within the States from this section of the Constitution. Many cases have been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject. I will call attention to only two which in my judgment are conclusive on this subject.

The first is the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S., p. 461). The opinion of the court was delivered by Justice Harlan, in which there was a dissenting opinion read by the Chief Justice, Justice Field, and Justice Brewer.

I quote from the opinion:

If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State.

But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. For, as said by this court in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S., 99, 103): "In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution. And it may be said generally that the legislation of the State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit."

In the case of Crossman v. Lurman (192 U. S.) the Supreme Court of the United States, without dissent from any judge, while Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Brewer were still upon the bench and participated in the hearing and decision, upheld the case of Plumley v. Massachusetts (155 U. S.).

In the opinion we find the following:

The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in the conservation of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive. It is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States, and can not be assumed by the National Government.

The court also said:

that legislation forbidding the sale of deceitful imitations of articles of food among the people does not abridge any privilege secured to citizens of the United States, nor in a just sense interfere with the freedom of commerce among the several States. It is legislation which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves.

The court cite the Plumley case with approval, and said:

Indeed, every contention here urged to show that the law of New York is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States was fully and expressly considered and negatived by the decision of this court in Plumley v. Massachusetts, supra. In that case the law of the State of Massachusetts forbidding the sale of oleomargarine, which was artificially colored, was applied to a sale in Massachusetts of an original package of that article which had been manufactured in and shipped from the State of Illinois. In the course of a full review of the previous cases relating to the subject, it was said, page 472:

"If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State. But that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the powers of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. For, as said by this court in Sherlock v. Alling (93 U. S., 99, 103): 'In conferring upon Congress the regulation of commerce it was never intended to cut the States off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country. Legislation, in a great variety of ways, may affect commerce and persons engaged in it without constituting a regulation of it within the meaning of the Constitution.

"'And it may be said generally that the legislation of a State not directed against commerce or any of its regulations, but relating to the rights, duties, and liabilities of citizens, and only indirectly and remotely affecting the operations of commerce, is of obligatory force upon citizens within its territorial jurisdiction, whether on land or water, or engaged in commerce, foreign or interstate, or in any other pursuit.'"

Again it was said, page 478:

"And yet it is supposed that the owners of a compound which has been put in a condition to cheat the public into believing that it is a particular article of food in daily use and eagerly sought by people in every condition of life are protected by the Constitution in making a sale of it against the will of the State in which it is offered for sale, because of the circumstance that it is an original package and has become a subject of ordinary traffic. We are unwilling to accept this view. We are of opinion that it is within the power of a State to exclude from its market any compound manufactured in another State which has been artificially colored or adulterated so as to cause it to look like an article of food in general use, and the sale of which may, by reason of such coloration or adulteration, cheat the general public into purchasing that which they may not intend to buy. The Constitution of the United States does not secure to anyone the privilege of defrauding the public."

Most of the States have enacted pure-food laws and enforce them. There is no necessity existing, even if the plea of necessity could justify Congress in endeavoring to enact police laws for the States.

As proof of this assertion I call attention to the testimony before the committee on that subject. I quote from the hearings:

Mr. BARTLETT. Most of the States, if not all, have what they call pure-food laws, and most of them have commissioners—how many of the States?

Doctor WILEY. Nearly all the States have food laws, and about twenty, or perhaps a few more, of them have provided for the enforcement of those laws. The others are just laws without any methods of enforcement; and, in so far as I know, in those States the laws are not enforced. But where the law provides for a machinery to enforce the law, in most States it is enforced very rigidly. That is all brought out in this statement.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I want. So you say that where they have adopted these food laws and appointed food commissioners or officers to watch the enforcement of them, they are enforced very properly?

Doctor WILEY. Yes; very efficiently, as far as the State can go. And I will say this, Mr. Chairman, that in every State, I believe, where the an act of the legislature, I believe in every other case these standards have been adopted by the food commissioners in toto.

This witness is the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture and has had more influence in bringing about this legislation probably than any one man, he in fact aiding in drafting the House bill we are now considering.

Mr. Chairman, I am not authorized to speak for any other State, but I do know that the State of Georgia has enacted laws for the protection of her people in the matter of foods; and I assert that we have enforced those laws in the past and will continue to do so in the future without the assistance, interference, or aid of the Federal Government. We claim the right reserved to our State to protect the health of the people of Georgia by our own State laws and to enforce those laws in our own courts against everyone whether they be citizens of the State or whether they reside in other States. On another occasion I referred to the laws of Georgia on this subject, and I now repeat what I then said:

The State of Georgia has a number of laws upon her statute books in the interest of pure food and against the selling of falsely branded goods, adulterated goods, or impure food.

These laws can be found, commencing with section 456 of the Criminal Code of Georgia, of 1895, in article 16 down to and including section 486 of article 17.

It may not be amiss to call attention to some of these provisions in the Georgia Code.

Section 456 prohibits the sale or offering for sale of any unclean, impure, unwholesome, or adulterated milk.

Sections 457, 458, and 459 prohibit the sale of imitations of butter and cheese as butter and cheese.

Sections 459 to 465 prohibit the sale of any article designed to be used as a substitute for food products, except as they shall be marked and branded as such substitutes.

Sections 446 to 468 punish the sale of unwholesome provisions, unwholesome bread, drink, or pernicious and adulterated liquor.

And it is made the duty of the grand juries in the several counties to specially inquire into all the violations of these laws and make presentments against the violators of these laws.

The whole of article 17, containing section 470 and sections following to 484, inclusive, prohibits the sale of adulterated and impure drugs, and prescribes penalties for the violations of these provisions.

Upon an investigation of these laws of Georgia, as contained in these sections, it will be seen that the State of Georgia has made ample provision for the protection of its people from imposition and injury from the sale of impure food, adulterated food, food products, and adulterated drugs. The grand juries of the State courts in Georgia are intelligent and upright men, and can be depended upon to indict violators of the law; and the trial juries are intelligent and honest, and as efficient in the enforcement of the law as the juries in the Federal courts. So far as Georgia is concerned there is no necessity for this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended when this bill was up for general debate, had I been present, to undertake, even though it might have been a futile and useless undertaking, to call the attention of the House to the reasons why the bill should not become a law, except as it may affect the District of Columbia, the Territories, and those places over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction. I was absent necessarily. I do not intend now, even if the committee was kind and gracious enough to permit me to do so, at his stage of the session or this stage of the consideration of this bill to detain the committee with those views. I have very decided views upon the subject. I have undertaken to put them in the minority report that was presented, and the House has had them printed. Even at the risk, Mr. Chairman, of being laughed at or scoffed at for making the statement that many of the provisions of this bill in my judgment violate the fundamental law of the land, I will repeat that statement, which I have endeavored to sustain by the decisions of the courts, even at the risk of being criticised and held up to the House and the country as a constitutional lawyer, a claim which I nowise make—I will insist that this bill violates the Constitution of the United States. But I console myself, Mr. Chairman, when that criticism is made upon those of us who assert that the Congress of the United States can and does, and has many times enacted laws——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman may have permission to conclude his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] asks that his colleague [Mr. BARTLETT] may have time to conclude his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. There are other important amendments, and we have to debate some of them. I object.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, then I ask that my colleague may have fifteen minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. No, sir; I am a member of this committee which reported this bill. I do not ask any indulgence. I was absent from the general debate necessarily—the first time I have been absent from the House in years.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman ought to have time.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, it is outside of the limitation of time.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not desire any indulgence either from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] or the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that at ten minutes of 4 o'clock the committee must rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia how much time he desires.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] allow me one suggestion?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will consume but five minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman from Georgia may have ten minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want but five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia may have five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have served some years in this House. I have never been absent in a debate on any great question, or any question at all, at any time, except when it is impossible for me by reason of physical disability of some kind to be here. And I appreciate the courtesy of my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who asked permission for me to speak for five minutes longer, and I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] who has objected.

Mr. Chairman, as I started to say, it does not affright me at all because gentlemen may criticise those of us who stand up and assert that the United States Congress has its powers limited by the Constitution and that there is legislation it can not enact. Those who occupy the position of critics and carpers at us who thus believe, and who criticise us as constitutional lawyers, do not affect my opinions. I might retort, Mr. Chairman, that some of those who make those assertions are neither constitutional lawyers nor any other kind of lawyer. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But, Mr. Chairman, fortified as I am, or as I believe I am, in my opposition to some of the provisions of this bill by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, I make bold to place my feeble opinion and vote against the current of hysteria which seems to be sweeping all over the country and which has for its purpose in its wild moments the destruction absolutely of the powers of the State governments and of all government except that asserted to be possessed by the United States Congress; and I shall oppose this endeavor, unlawfully as I maintain, to carry out that purpose to centralize all power in the Federal Government.

I hold in my hands the decisions of the court in reference to the subject of food and food products, in reference to the power of the States to protect the health of the States and the morals of the people of the States; which declare that the States are supreme and no power of Congress can take away that supremacy or destroy it; nor can Congress assume to enact and enforce within the States laws which are solely the exercise of the police powers. The General Government has no police power within the States, and all efforts to confer such power must fail, else we have arrived at that period in the history of this confederated Republic when all power has been federalized in one single government, when the old-time idea of independent and sovereign States are but a memory of the past.

For myself I do not desire to interfere or to take them away, these rights of the States, and I will not be found joining with those who desire to destroy them.

Before I conclude I want to call the attention of this House to a statement made by the Speaker of this House in a speech delivered by him at the beginning of this year to a Republican club in the city of Philadelphia. Coming from the sage statesman who fills that chair, a man of long experience in public affairs and in this House, I desire to put it in the RECORD so that the country may know the views that he has upon this subject and the efforts now being made to centralize all power in the Federal Government. I quote from that speech. Said Mr. CANNON:

REPUBLIC'S GREATEST DANGER.

In my judgment the greatest danger to the Republic comes from the citizen who refuses or neglects to participate in governing in local, State, and national affairs and seeks protection from the government to which he does not contribute according to his ability or means. In my judgment the danger now to us is not the weakening of the Federal Government, but rather the failure of the forty-five sovereign States to exercise, respectively, their function, their jurisdiction, touching all matters not granted to the Federal Government. This danger does not come from the desire of the Federal Government to grasp power not conferred by the Constitution, but rather from the desire of citizens of the respective States to cast upon the Federal Government the responsibility and duty that they should perform.

If the Federal Government continues to centralize we will soon find that we will have a vast bureaucratic government, which will prove inefficient if not corrupt. [Loud applause.]

I commend the wise words of our distinguished presiding officer to Republicans and Democrats alike. Let us aid him in halting the onward march to centralization and bureaucracy—let us preserve our Republic from inefficiency and corruption.

In vain will those who assert the doctrine search the pages of the Constitution find one word that authorizes the Congress of the United States to exercise police powers within the domain of the State. Equally futile will be the effort to find a decision to authorize it.

Mr. Chairman, the States of this Union, the most of them, have enacted pure-food laws, and they enforce them, at least to the satisfaction of their citizens. From the evidence before the Committee of Interstate and Foreign Commerce, of which I am a member, it appears these laws are being enforced in the States; and to the States under the Constitution is granted the power, and not to the General Government, to protect its people in its health, its morals, and general welfare. Against the prostitution of the Constitution which would rob the States of this power, or usurp it, I enter my sincere and earnest protest. [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, we have in our State a law on the subject of food, but it is not a very perfect statute. The history of the country and all our experience to-day shows that Federal supervision of all matters that pertain to the entire people of the country and to all the States is far superior in its efficiency to any single State supervision. It is the experience in our own State, where we have a food commissioner, whose duties are largely to attend to the sanitary conditions of butter and cheese, cider, and a few other products. Our food commissioner recently issued a bulletin. After an examination of forty-five different products, he found that only twenty of the products which he examined were pure, the other twenty-five being adulterated. In his bulletin Mr. Redfern, our food commissioner, says:

Particular attention has been paid to the spices found on the market.

I was interested in the statement of the gentleman from Illinois on the subject of spices the other day.

The Omaha World-Herald says:

Twenty pure food products have been discovered by Deputy Food Commissioner Redfern in the forty-five samples he has analyzed during the last three months. The other twenty-five samples were found to be adulterated and colored with such delectable substances as gypsum, sulphites, borax, glucose, coal tar, saccharine, and aniline dyes. The following is Mr. Redfern's bulletin:

"In the present bulletin of the commission some attention has been paid to the condition of spices found on the market. It is surprising that gypsum is used in such large quantities as an adulterant; in one case as much as 16 per cent was used. Ginger and cayenne pepper seem to have more of this inert substance added to them than any of the other spices. Turmeric, one of the ingredients of curry powder, is nearly always used with gypsum in gingers, owing to the fact that its intense yellow color will hide the presence of the gypsum, which would otherwise give the ginger a pale, suspicious color.

"A few samples of canned meats were analyzed and all found to contain borax or sulphites or both. Sulphites are injurious, and of borax Doctor Wiley, of the United States Department of Agriculture, says: 'Borax when continuously administered in small doses for a long period or when given in large quantities for a short period creates disturbances of appetite, of digestion, and health.' Of the fruit products analyzed the majority were found to be imitation products, colored to represent the fruit, and composed of starch and glucose. In a sample of pineapple preserves glucose formed the bulk of the product, with saccharine added as a sweetener. This artificial sugar is made from analine, and as it is from 300 to 500 times as sweet as cane sugar, it is often used as a substitute. It has no food value, and passes through the body unchanged. A sample of strawberry pop was found to be colored with analine dye and sweetened with this saccharine. The drinking of such mixtures should be discouraged.

"Out of six samples of cream of tartar bought on the market three were found to be composed of a large percentage of starch and phosphates. These mixtures sold for the same price as the pure tartar. Such practices are certainly fraudulent, for when the consumer calls for cream of tartar the law should see that he gets it and not a cheap mixture of tartar, starch, and phosphate of lime. A deplorable condition was found in the case of the cayenne pepper. Out of eight samples, six were colored with analine dye and adulterated with gypsum. It is hoped that our next legislature will see fit to pass a law that will stop such wholesale adulterations or at least compel the articels of food to be properly labeled, so that the consumer will know what he is buying. The pure-food question has been taken up by many of the women's clubs throughout the State, and it is desired that they ask their representatives and senators to the coming legislature to support a law which will give the State jurisdiction over all classes of food products, many of which at the present are badly adulterated."

The history of all these matters shows that the State is never able properly to control the adulteration of food products designed for interstate commerce, and that the great arm of the Federal Government alone will be able to supervise the manufacture and sale of those food products in all of which we are so vitally interested. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a few remarks about the purposes of this bill and discuss the power of Congress to control interstate and foreign commerce and the power of the States to control local or State commerce. I shall vote for this bill, amended the best we can, because it is the best that we can now pass, and certainly, I think, something should be done to help the cause of pure food and to aid the States in enforcing their pure-food laws.

If Congress prohibits the shipping into a State or Territory of impure foods, it will lessen the burdens of and aid the States and Territories in enforcing their pure-food laws. It will prevent the evil, to a large extent, from coming into the State and Territory, and thus the State and Territorial laws can be more easily and perfectly enforced. With this view in mind, I shall support this bill and try to make the pending bill a better one as we proceed.

Congress has complete power, "plenary power," as the Supreme Court has repeatedly held, notably in the Addyston Pipe Trust Company, to "prohibit" obnoxious interstate or foreign commerce. We prohibited foreign commerce by the embargo acts in the days of Jefferson and at other times. We prohibited whisky being shipped to the Indians. We prohibited a great many objectionable products being shipped from one State to another under laws based on the commerce clause of the Constitution. We prohibit monopolies in Federal commerce. We prohibit contracts made in Federal commerce, by which obnoxious trusts and combinations are made, and the Supreme Court passed on this very question in the Pipe case. My understanding is that this bill has been based as completely as possible on this commerce clause, which gives to Congress the right to "prohibit" or regulate Federal commerce, which includes the right to cause it to be prepared to be shipped in its pure and proper state from one State to another, etc.

I do not disagree with a single proposition of the law, that I recall, announced by my friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] yesterday.

I think he misapplied the law to the particular case now in hand, to wit, this bill. Local, domestic, or State commerce is completely under the control of the several States. Federal commerce—that is, interstate and foreign commerce—when Congress does not act, may be curtailed by the States, in so far as it is obnoxious to the police laws of the States; but where Congress takes complete control of the Federal commerce, the States can not take charge of and control that same commerce, and why? Because Congress has taken complete control; the two authorities are then in conflict, and, by the very words of the Constitution, the Federal law is the supreme law of the land. The Congress may abuse this power. So may the States. These powers exist, but should be wisely exercised always.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall not quote any law. I have not the time nor has the committee the time for me to do that. I shall content myself with referring the House to a very pertinent opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, reported in 154 United States Reports, page 209, in the case, Covington Bridge Company v. Kentucky, where the commerce powers of Congress and the States are fully discussed by Mr. Justice Brown. In that case the court distinctly declares, first, that the State commerce is controllable by the States only, except, of course, such incidental interference as is absolutely necessary to execute some express grant of power given to Congress; the second class of commerce is that Federal commerce which may be obnoxious to the morals and health of the State which the States can police when Congress has failed in part or entirely to take charge of and regulate, and the third class is where Congress takes complete control of the Federal commerce and regulates it. It is these three classes that are alluded to by Mr. Justice Brown in this very elaborate opinion.

Mr. GARRETT. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT. Do you think it will aid the States to enforce the police power to provide expressly that they shall not interfere with a package branded according to the rule set up by the Department in this case?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I made an inquiry about that yesterday, because I did not fully understand that provision; but, my dear sir, we can not make a perfect law the first time we try. I think the provision goes too far, but the gentlemen in charge of the bill do not think so. We can try to change that. We should make this law now as perfect as we can, and in the next session of Congress or soon hereafter we can perfect it. I know of no one who will do his part better or more intelligently than my colleague from Tennessee. I am against the impure and dirty thing, whether it is in a State commerce or commerce between the States or wherever it is. If there are State laws to crush the evil in local or State commerce, I want the Federal Government to join hands with the State authorities and to prevent noxious foods and products being transported from one State to another. Do that and you aid the States and help save the people from these evils in a great measure.

Mr. Chairman, I am happy to see the great moral wave that is sweeping all over this country. There is reform going on in everything throughout the United States. In all of the States the people are getting into the saddle, and in another year the man with unclean hands will not be permitted to hold office and the unclean thing will not be permitted, and the guilty ones will be published, whether rich or poor.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You say you want the Federal Government to join hands with the States and aid the States in enforcing the law?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. There are a number of States that prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors and the importation of intoxicating liquors—States like Iowa and Kansas.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Now, instead of passing the Hepburn-Dolliver bill, are you not in favor of passing a bill preventing the shipment of intoxicating liquors into those States?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Wherever a State has a prohibition law I think the United States Government should aid the State in enforcing it. This discourages the whisky evil and builds up the State.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Are you in favor of aiding the States by passing a law that will prevent the shipment of intoxicating liquors into the States?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want the Federal Government to help the States to do that very thing, and also stop the sending of deleterious products into the States, thus aiding local laws and upbuilding States rights. We are striking now that way at an evil the States can not or have not controlled. Let Congress aid the States to control.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD two brief newspaper extracts on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee to extend his remarks in the RECORD?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman did not ask to extend his remarks generally, and I do not want him to print in the RECORD any indictments or court records, as he suggested this morning.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I am not talking about that now. These newspaper extracts show that the authorities of the State of Pennsylvania condemned 3,842 pounds of bad beef yesterday and found 104 impure samples of food out of a total of 120 samples.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the newspaper extracts to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ALL BAD BEEF BARRED NOW—3,842 POUNDS CONDEMNED BY HEALTH INSPECTORS LAST WEEK.

Director Coplin yesterday completed his report that will be made to the board of health next Tuesday concerning the meat inspection conducted recently by the inspectors of the health department. He said he felt satisfied that none but good meat was coming into the city, because shippers were alarmed at the rigid investigation made by the meat inspectors.

The shippers, according to information received by Director Coplin, are now shunting all cars containing any but the best meat to nearby towns, to prevent any poor meat getting into our market.

The report of the inspection will show that for the week ending on June 16, 3,842 pounds of meat were condemned, and that 800 inspections were made of city slaughterhouses.

There were 60 slaughterhouses condemned at unfit. Of 41 live animals inspected, 12 were killed and the meat condemned.

ARRESTS IN PURE-FOOD WAR—104 OUT OF 120 SAMPLES SHOWED ADULTERATION.

The State dairy and food commission, under the direction of Dr. Benjamin H. Warren, has taken steps to prosecute dealers selling adulterated produce and meats. Two cases for selling adulterated "knackwurst," a kind of sausage, were brought before Magistrate Beaton yesterday. They were Leo Zimmerman, of 717 North Second street, and Abraham Cohen, of 212 South street. The former was fined $57.50 and the latter was held in $500 bail for court.

Doctor Warren asserts that the investigations of his department have shown that there is much adulterated food sold, and that action will be taken against several dealers shortly. (Philadelphia Ledger, June 23, 1906.)

Now, if Congress had prevented these bad foods being sent into Pennsylvania, the State of Pennsylvania would not have had this trouble and expense. This bill proposes to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following committee amendment: On page 23, in line 6, after the word "prior," insert the words "or subsequent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 23, in line 6, after the word "prior," insert "or subsequent."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21 strike out lines 3, 4, and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Third. If in package form, the approximate quantity of the contents of the package, at the time put up, be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package: Provided, That the use of particular sizes of packages established by recognized custom of trade may be authorized and permitted by and in accordance with rules and regulations established from time to time under the provisions of section 2 of this act."

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me just for a moment, to submit a request for unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois desires to submit a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is the "package amendment." In the form in which it is presented to the committee, owing to the parliamentary situation, this is not subject to amendment in Committee of the Whole. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have no desire, especially in reference to a new proposition of this sort, to attempt in any way to bind the Committee of the Whole, and I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which I have offered may be treated as an amendment in the first degree and subject to amendment in the second degree.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment just reported may be considered as an amendment in the first degree.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is that just what the gentleman wants? Does he not want the provision in the bill to be regarded as an amendment of the first degree?

Mr. MANN. No; I want this amendment to be treated as an amendment in the first degree for the purpose of amending in the second degree, and not beyond that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the amendment just reported may be considered as an amendment in the first degree, subject only to amendment in the second degree. That does not involve the proposition of a substitute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ESCH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 19431. An act permitting the building of a dam across the Mississippi River between the counties of Stearns and Sherburne, in the State of Minnesota;

H. R. 12086. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington and Western Maryland Railroad Company;

H. R. 9528. An act to reimburse Fred Dickson for loss of his tools through the fire which destroyed the engine house at Fort Duchesne, Utah, on September 19, 1902;

H. R. 5998. An act creating the Mesa Verde National Park; and

H. J. Res. 160. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to furnish a certain gun carriage to the mayor of the city of Ripley, Lauderdale County, Tenn.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 7099. An act to amend section 2871 of the Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 3245) creating the Mesa Verde National Park.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after the word "third," on page 21, line 3, up to and including the word "package," on line 5, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "If in package form and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure they are not plainly and correctly stated on the outside of the package."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that this is an amendment to the amendment just offered?

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be considered as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand that a substitute is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire it to be treated as an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I will modify it so as to make it read: "Strike out all after the word 'form' and insert what I have sent to the desk."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the proposed amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out of the amendment all after the word "form" in the first line, and insert "and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure they are not plainly and correctly stated on the outside of the package."

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, may we have the Clerk report the amendment as it would read if adopted. Let the paragraph be read as it would read if the amendment were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Third. If in package form and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure they are not plainly and correctly stated on the outside of the package.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss very briefly this amendment. In the first place, Mr. Chairman, this bill is a bill to provide for pure food. It is a bill which relates to quality and not to quantity, a provision to protect not the pocketbook so much as it is the stomachs of the American people.

I take it that it is not the desire of this committee to change trade conditions, to impose upon those who have been interested in a particular line of industry for decades a provision which is onerous. Certainly it is not the desire of this committee to so legislate unless the conditions are such that there is a demand for such legislation, unless frauds are perpetrated on the consumer to such an extent that they should be prohibited and prevented.

Now, the facts are, Mr. Chairman, that a very large majority of all the products of the canning companies in this country, whether they be inclosed in tin or in glass, are sold by the package and have been so sold for decades. The cans which have been presented by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois do not bear upon their labels any statement as to the weight or quantity of the contents of the package, and it has not been the custom of the trade to so label packages, and if they have been sold by weight, it has been by people, not those who manufacture the product, but by the retailer who perpetrated the fraud on the consumer.

It is practically a ridiculous or impossible proposition to say that a man who puts up jelly by the jar shall label that jar, that glass, as to the amount, either in weight or quantity, that it contains. The buyer cares nothing about the weight; the housewife knows nothing about the weight; she has been accustomed to purchase jelly by the package, by the glass, and she never gives a thought to the question whether it weighs 8 ounces, 6 ounces, or 12 ounces. The package is before her and she sees what it is, and so purchases it for what it is. And the same is true of catsup; the same is true of corn, peas, beans, and all such products. The fact is that the identical can filled with one commodity weighs from 2 to 4 ounces less or more than if filled with another commodity. The variation in weight is all the way from 2 to 4 ounces, depending upon the commodity inclosed in the can, when the cans are absolutely of the same size. It is also true that the commodity put up at one time in the year or in another, canned during an exceedingly dry or a very wet season, will differ a trifle year by year. So that it is impossible in the conduct of the business to regulate the size of the can and use the same label in June or in August, or use the same label in 1904 and 1905, and have them in every case correctly state the quantity of the contents of the package.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I ask that the gentleman may have ten minutes, as he represents that side of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the gentleman from New York may have ten minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALZELL. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, the canner would not be obliged to put anything as to weight or quantity on the can.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. DALZELL. But if he did put it on, then it must be put on correctly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. DALZELL. That is the purpose of the amendment?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know enough about the tinning business, or does anybody else in the House know enough, to tell whether it is difficult to make these cans of substantially the same size or not?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not at all difficult to make tin cans of the same size, but they will vary a little in weight at all times, depending upon the weight of the tin of which the can is made.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it difficult to make bottles of substantially the same size?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is absolutely impossible to make bottles of identically the same weight. For instance, let me illustrate, if I may, to the gentleman from Missouri. In connection with a representative of the Curtice Brothers' concern of Rochester, one of the most reputable business houses in this country, who put up millions of jars and cans of the best product of fruits and vegetables known to the trade, he and I together weighed fifty glass jars of catsup. They were all made in the factory and supposed to be identical. They were all filled. I will defy any man who saw any one of those fifty bottles to determine which one, if any, weighed one single fraction of an ounce more or less than the other. Yet those fifty bottles varied in weight from 13 ounces to 15.1 ounces, and the firm had done its level best to have each one of those packages weigh 14 ounces.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the same rule apply as to glass jars as to bottles? That is, that it is impossible to make them the same?

Mr. SHERMAN. That rule would apply to anything that is put up in glass. It is physically impossible to make each one of a dozen glass containers weigh precisely the same.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have heard from people who know a good deal about bottles that quart and pint bottles are deliberately made about one drink short. [Laughter.] I don't know anything about it myself, but I am asking for information.

Mr. SHERMAN. The gentleman is now talking about bottles which contain the product of corn, I suppose, which is grown in his country. I am talking about bottles in the main which contain some substance other than corn, either in its liquid or solid form.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from New York to permit me to make a statement in answer to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM. These bottles are all blown by the breath of the glass blower, and he can not regulate that breath so as to make all the bottles alike. It is impossible.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Nobody wants to put an unreasonable hardship on the makers of cans or bottles or jars. If they can make them of substantially the same size, they ought to be made to do so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, they can not make them of identically the same weight.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And if they can not, there is no sense in putting it in the law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Did the gentleman from New York find any of those bottles overweight?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly; just as many as underweight. I would like to call attention to the fact that if the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will take any one of these cans before us and fill it with oats grown on his farm, and then fill it with oats grown on an adjoining farm, he will undoubtedly find a difference in the weight. It is impossible to have the weight the same.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Do the foreign traders in canned goods sold in this country put labels on the cans indicating the quantity?

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not, and they never have. The canned-goods product is sold by the package and it always has been. Let me read this amendment:

> If in package form and the contents are stated in terms of weight or measure, they shall be plainly and correctly stated.

This does not compel a statement of the weight or measure. I do not wish to permit the canners or any other manufacturers or producers in this country to deceive the public, and what little I have done in this House will demonstrate that fact.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Is it not a fact that both with reference to glass vessels and tin vessels they are frequently made purposely of small size? Is not that really the evil to be guarded against, rather than the matter of weight?

Mr. SHERMAN. Neither the glass vessel nor the tin can is made with reference to containing a special amount in pounds or ounces, but the sizes have become standardized in the trade without any reference to what they weigh, and they have been so dealt with in the trade for decades, and no purchaser from any canner ever suggests anything about the weight in the can. They are not known by weight and they never have been known by weight. The proposition offered by the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Illinois and by the original provision of the bill, is to compel the trade to do what it has never done—label the amount either in quarts or pints or pounds or ounces of the contents of the package. That would revolutionize trade conditions.

Mr. DE ARMOND. The gentleman does not understand quite the purpose of my inquiry. What I am trying to get at is the evil I think exists by having vessels, of glass or tin or other material, purposely made small. Now, for instance, take a fifth or fourth of a gallon, or take one can that would hold liquid, say 1 quart, and another can that would hold fifteen-sixteenths or fourteen-sixteenths or thirteen-sixteenths or twelve-sixteenths. Now, I think the most fraud perpetrated is the putting off upon unsuspecting individuals a comparatively small can for a full-sized can, and if that can be met, it seems to me that all correctible features as to this would be covered by the legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know what may be done in the whisky trade. Seemingly the gentleman's question has reference to that.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Oh, no; it has reference to cans just as well.

Mr. SHERMAN. But in the trade the product of which is contained in tin cans there is no thought of making a can which will contain any less than it is supposed to contain, and never has been.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Say you are a jobber in cans. You can order a lot of cans that will contain approximately—of course it can not be exactly—fifteen-sixteenths of a quart. Now, then, if you do that, you will sell those to the wholesaler for fifteen-sixteenths size; he will probably sell them to the retailer for fifteen-sixteenths of a quart, but the retailer may sell them to the customer for a full quart, which, I think, is where there is the most deception.

Mr. SHERMAN. That can not be done under the amendment which I have offered. If the quantity is stated, it must be correctly stated. My amendment says if the contents of the package are stated in terms of weight or measure they shall be plainly and correctly stated, and that, I think, should be done. I do not believe the public should be deceived, but I do not want this House to say to a trade that has been selling in package form for some quarter of a century without any regard to the contents of the package, where the housewife is not deceived, where the housewife knows what she is buying, I do not want the House to say, "You must label this package," where it would be necessary, in order to have precisely the same weight in the can, to have your labels vary year by year, or possibly month by month, as to the commodities as well. I say that this provision here is a full and ample protection; that it does prevent precisely what the gentleman from Missouri desires to have prevented. It does prevent the selling to the people a package of any substance which is supposed to weigh a pound and having it marked a pound unless it contains a pound. It permits the sale of a package for a package, and let the package show for itself what it is; but if we attempt to say that is a pound package or a pound jar or a pound can, there must be a pound in the receptacle.

Mr. DE ARMOND. That was a matter I was directing attention to, not by way of criticising——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask——

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not ask a further extension. I do not wish any more than my fair share of time; but I thank the gentleman for his intended courtesy.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire simply to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, and in support of my position I desire to have read a letter from a packing house in my Congressional district, a firm of individuals whom I take great pleasure in certifying are men of the highest character, a member of whom is president of a canning association of some ten or twelve States.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHILLICOTHE, OHIO, April 16, 1906.

Hon. CHAS. H. GROSVENOR, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have taken the liberty to wire you, per inclosed copy, calling your attention to at least one undesirable feature in the Heyburn pure-food bill now pending. I practically covered this ground in my letter of the 30th ultimo. The feature to which I referred is including on each package the weight of the package. After consulting with a good many of the canners in the Central West, it is the general impression that this feature of the bill would bring no good results to the consumers, and that it would be an expensive operation to the canners. Packers' cans that are now being used are practically of uniform size, and they are manufactured and sold in the following sizes: No. 1 standard, No. 1 tall, No. 1½, No. 2, No. 2½, No. 3 standard, No. 3 tall, and No. 10.

In putting up canned goods a certain amount of liquor is necessarily used in the way of brines or sirups. None are packed absolutely dry, so that the weight of the can would be no protection to the consumers, as the cans weigh practically uniformly when filled with fruit or vegetables and with the proper amount of brine. Of course there is a slight variation, owing, principally, to the inability to built automatic machinery that will fill cans absolutely correct. However, as above stated, it would be no protection to the consumers, unless the law would provide that the net contents of the can weigh a given amount after the liquor has been drained off. It is the effort of every honest packer, who is looking for reputation and prestige in the trade, to give the consumers an honest product and as much goods in the can as can consistently be put therein. The quantity of the fruit or vegetable put into the can depends largely upon the packer's method.

Under a certain process of sterilization goods can be packed somewhat drier than under another. Both processes would probably be considered first class and up to date. A great many of the products are put into the cans automatically, and while there is approximately a uniform amount, there will be some slight variation. It would be a great expense, and curtail the output of an up-to-date plant, to undertake to weigh every can accurately for an absolute weight. It strikes me—and I think I am expressing the sentiment of all honest packers who are catering for the good will of the consumers—that this feature of the bill is unnecessary, and that it would be a handicap to the packers, who are the most ardent supporters of the pure-food bill. As the presiding officer of the Western Packers' Canned Goods Association, which includes several hundred representative canners in the Central States, I feel that I am expressing their almost unanimous opinion when I suggest that this feature of the bill be eliminated. The packers in the association, of which I have the honor to be the head at the present time, are unanimously and most emphatically in favor of a pure-food law which will compel the manufacturers of canned goods to use the best methods and put up goods that are absolutely free from deleterious or unhealthful substances. While they are unanimous on this point, I believe that they feel that the feature in the law to which I have called your attention is not essential and is impracticable. A law to be practicable in this respect would require a good deal of technical information and knowledge in order to frame it so that it would be any protection to the consumers. On the other hand, it is bound to be an expensive handicap to the canning industry.

I hope you will pardon me for encroaching upon your time again on this subject. However, the importance of this matter to the canning fraternity is so great that I feel that the above should be brought to your attention. While I am very busy at this time, if thought necessary, and if it could be arranged, I would feel that it is my duty to go before the committee and give them any information on the subject which they feel I am in position to give.

With best regards, I am yours, very respectfully,

L. A. SEARS,
President of Western Packers' Canned Goods Association.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in connection with the letter the statement of the association to which the gentleman refers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by the insertion of the document to which he refers. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The statement is as follows:

DEAR SIR: Referring to subsection 3 of section 7 of the Senate bill, No. 88, as amended by the House, known as the "weight or measure clause of the pure-food bill," we, the Western Packers' Canned Goods Association, packers of fruits and vegetables, desire to present the following suggestions for amendments to the bill as it now reads:

Subsection 3 of the bill referred to provides that an article of food shall be deemed misbranded:

"If in package form the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package."

Since this bill was reported the following amendment has been agreed upon by the committee having it in charge, to be offered on the floor of the House of Representatives:

"Third. If in package form, the approximate quantity of the contents of the package, at the time put up, be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure, on the outside of the package: Provided, That the use of particular sizes of packages established by recognized custom of trade shall be authorized and permitted by and in accordance with rules and regulations established from time to time under the provisions of section 2 of this act."

We suggest the following changes in subsection 3, which we think would remove the objectionable feature and make the regulation applicable to canned fruits and vegetables. This amends by striking out the words "at the time put up" and inserts "except fruits and vegetables in hermetically sealed packages, preserved by process of sterilization," making it read as follows:

"Third. If in package form, the approximate quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package, except in the case of fruits and vegetables in hermetically sealed packages, preserved by process of sterilization: Provided, etc." Also the word "shall" in place of "may" be authorized.

The adoption of any provision which requires the quantity of the contents of the can to be placed on the can, either exactly, approximately, or the minimum quantity, will serve no useful purpose to the consumer, is impracticable, would not accomplish the purpose sought, would add largely to the expense of packing, and its enforcement would prove a menace to a most important industry.

We are heartily in favor of the pure-food requirements of the committee bill, as is every packer in the country, for the effect of its enforcement will be to give the people confidence in the purity of canned fruits and vegetables and largely increase consumption.

The gross weight of the can printed on the label, or the net weight of the contents of the can printed on the label, would be practicable for goods sold by weight, but impracticable for canned fruits and vegetables put up in hermetically sealed cans.

The truth is, the weight or measure on the can would be meaningless and no protection to the consumer. The value of the contents of a can is based upon its solid contents to some extent; but a far greater value is produced by the selection, excellence, and succulency of the product. For instance, a full can of a given size of coarse string beans, or of peas of the larger siftings, would not be worth, in eating merits, to discriminating consumers as much as a can of the same size packed with only one-half the net weight of the same vegetable in just the proper stage of maturity to get the best results as to flavor and excellence.

It has been said that the consumer has been imposed upon by the variation in the size of the cans. We wish to state that there is no variation in the size of standard packages. The 1-pound regular, the 1-pound tall, the 1½-pound, the 2-pound, the 2½-pound, and the 3-pound sized packages are made from a standard scale fitted down to the thirty-second of an inch, and they are never any different. If you would write for a price on a 1-pound sized tin to any number of different manufacturers of tin cans in this country, all would know what you want and would quote you identically the same sized package. The variation of these different sized packages has grown out of the needs and requirements of the consumers. If a small family wants a 1-pound can of peas, they want it because it is sufficient for their requirements. If another family wants a 1½-pound can of peas, they want it for the reason that it is a little larger and contains more peas than the 1-pound size, and will satisfy their needs. The different sized cans in which canners are packing fruits and vegetables have grown into use because consumers desire them.

In no case has a standard been adopted for tin cans, except a standard of measurement which is in common use by can manufacturers and packers of canned fruits and vegetables. This standard is not given in terms of measure, as fluid ounces, nor in pounds or fractions of pounds. It simply gives the diameter and height of the cans in which the goods are packed. A reference to any trade journal will give you the standard sizes of cans now in use by packers in this country. No one knows just what these packages weigh; they vary according to the density or specific gravity of the goods therein. In view of the fact that canned fruits and vegetables are never sold by the pound and are never said to weigh so many pounds or fractions of a pound, but are called 1-pound, 2-pound, 3-pound, etc., it is unnecessary to have any standard as to weight or measure on this class of goods, except possibly a statement that this can is full standard 1-pound size, or other size, according to what it is sold for. There would be no objection to having a law stating the size of the can to be used in each case and naming a standard which would be acceptable, the standard to be according to measurement and not to weight.

In canned vegetables and fruits the gross weight would be the can and the contents, including the vegetable or fruit and the liquor necessary to add to preserve and flavor the goods. The net weight would be the contents of the can less the amount of liquor that was added. To illustrate: You might pack a can full of solid meat tomatoes without adding any water or liquor, and if the tomatoes were slightly overripe and a little overcooked in the process of sterilization, the tomatoes would disintegrate and a large per cent of water or liquor would result.

Again, very young and tender, succulent corn, packed in its own milk, after sterilization might not contain anywhere near as much solids after the milk or juice has been drained off as a cheaper or inferior grade, which, owing to the conditions under which it was packed, might show absolute solidity of pack.

In canned vegetables and fruits more or less liquor must be added, so it would be impossible to establish a net weight of the product that should be put into the cans, as under different conditions under which the same class of products must be handled the weight would vary.

The great staple products—corn, peas, and tomatoes—are put into the cans by machinery, which fill the cans automatically by measure at the rate of from sixty to ninety cans per minute, and from the filling machines the cans pass to the capping or soldering machines, which permanently seal the cans ready for the final process of sterilization. By this automatic process the cans are uniformly filled, but the weight will vary more or less, according to the consistency of the goods.

The above represents the unanimous opinion of our association, composed of canners in the following States: Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Nebraska, Missouri, Kansas, Kentucky, Idaho, Colorado, Minnesota, Wisconsin.

Yours, respectfully,

L. A. SEARS, President.
F. F. WILEY, Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire sympathy with the general motives of this bill, but I am afraid that we are liable to make some serious mistakes and do the business of the country more harm than good. I would say I was in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York if I were not afraid, if taking statements made in the general debate, that his amendment would be entirely without force or effect. His amendment I agree to in every respect if it would have any efficacy at all. It is unnecessary, in my opinion, because in quite as clear and distinct language the same provision is already twice in this bill.

In the same section to which the amendment is proposed there will be found two provisions covering exactly what he proposes by his amendment. Turning to page 20, in section 7, it reads:

That the term "misbranded" as used herein shall apply to all drugs, or articles of food, or articles which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or substances contained in such article, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular.

Then take the paragraph following, the one that is proposed to be amended, the fourth on page 21. We find a repetition of this, as follows:

If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular.

In substance the same thing is in section 1 of the bill.

Now, what is propsed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN] is to say, in the third paragraph:

If in package form the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly or correctly stated in terms of weight or measure.

That is only to make in the same section three reiterations of the necessity of the label being a truthful statement. But it does not reach what I understand the committee claims, and that is that all packages are to be labeled.

If the gentleman from Illinois will give attention, I would like to know whether he claims, as was generally stated in the general debate, that all packages are required to be branded or labeled that go into interstate trade under the bill.

Mr. MANN. Under the amendment that was offered all packages would be required either to have on them weight or measure of the contents, or to have on them, subject to the rules and regulations, that standard sizes, giving the size.

Mr. KEIFER. Aside from the proposed amendment?

Mr. MANN. Without naming in that case the weight or measure.

Mr. KEIFER. Aside from the proposed amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois and from the clause contained in the three lines on page 21, I want to know whether the bill in general terms requires a branding of all packages.

Mr. MANN. It does not include a branding of all packages. It provides against a misbrand.

Mr. KEIFER. Then, Mr. Chairman, what I think is best to do is try to amend the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] so as to make it clear, and not merely to reiterate here that the branding shall be truthful, for that is already provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have just a moment more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute. Is there objection?

Mr. KEIFER. Make it five minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to get the gentleman time to help him out, and now he objects to my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. TALBOTT] is recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will again state the question. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I offer this excuse for asking a little more time, that there are in my district several of the largest canning establishments in the United States. They can in the proper season tomatoes, but more largely, along the valley of the Scioto, in Ohio, they can sweet or sugar corn. There are thousands and thousands of acres devoted each year to the raising of corn for these canneries. They daily can many thousand cans, and if they have to mark each can, either as to weight or measure, they can not carry on their business at all. I only wish that this bill shall be such that the canners can make a fair branding. They are entirely willing that an honest brand shall be required, but if an impossible or impracticable brand is required they will probably be driven out of a business of great interest to the people of this country. This would be a calamity and unnecessary in this legislation.

And let me add to what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]. If you will take corn from the same field in a certain condition and can it, heat it, take it out of the same vat, put it in the cans of the same size, hot, seal it, and then puncture it to let the steam off, and then cool it and afterwards close it, and weigh two cans treated in that way it will be a coincidence if they will weigh exactly the same, because the evaporation or something else will vary. They are perfectly willing, as I understand it, that the size of the cans in each case shall be honestly branded. [Cries of "Vote!"[

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district that is, perhaps, as much interested, or more so, in this proposition than any other in the country. Now, not a single gentleman engaged in canning in that district I represent desires to interfere with the enactment of a law providing for pure food. They do object to the enactment of legislation that will interfere with the business that they are the pioneers in. The pioneers in the canning industry were in my district. In 1870 the first census was taken of the canning industry. The capital invested was about $2,000,000, and only ninety-seven establishments. In 1900 there were in this country 2,182 establishments, and the increase of establishments from 1900 to now, 1905, is 2,687.

Now, our people contend, Mr. Chairman, that this industry, that has flourished and been developed without Federal legislation, is an industry that has given to the people of this country a pure food, cheap vegetables, almost as good as in the natural state. They would not object to the enactment of this paragraph if it were possible to comply with the provisions of it. There are two billions and a half of cans manufactured in this country in a year. The canning period or the canning season in this district for tomatoes, corn, peas, beans, and all those vegetables is short, and not one word is included in the hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on that subject. The canning season is only about six weeks in a year. Can you expect an industry like this to undertake to put either the approximate or correct weight on 2,500,000,000 cans in that short period? Gentlemen, it is impossible. If they were to try to do it, they would have to weigh each can to itself. Corn raised on one farm will weigh more per quart or per bushel than corn raised on another farm. Tomatoes raised on one property will weigh more per bushel than those raised on another property. The character of the soil has much to do with it. A rich piece of land will raise good tomatoes, good corn, good peas, and will give the highest weight. Poor land raises inferior goods, and goods of less weight. Our people are as honest as any people in the land. They would comply with a provision like this if it were possible; but it is not possible; and I want to state to the committee that the impression sought to be made and possibly was made on the Members of this House and the people of the country, that the canners were guilty of putting upon the country and upon the market short-weight cans—that is not true. You can take and examine every can of tomatoes, corn, peas, or whatever they contain on that table, and you will find on the can as it was bought by the gentleman from Illinois no weight mark whatever. Therefore it was given to the dealer without any weight upon the can, and if any fraud has been perpetrated upon the people, you are after the wrong fellow. You want to get after the dealer. [Applause, and cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and I most heartily concur in all the arguments he has made. In addition I desire to call attention to a few objections to the bill as an original proposition. First, as I stated in reply to the gentleman from Missouri, it is impossible under the present system of manufacture to blow glass bottles so as to contain actually the same weight or contain the same quantity. The manufacturer may have molds prepared for the manufacture of particular sizes, but according to the strength of wind of the glass blower, as he blows into the mold, the bottle may be light or heavy. It is impossible to have them of exactly the same weight, and manufacturers would be constantly laying themselves liable for misstatements by reason of those variations, no matter how slight. Second, in regard to the variation of weight and measure of contents of packages, they may vary on account of evaporation and consequent shrinkage, and that variation will necessarily increase as time elapses from date of original packing.

Mr. PRINCE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAHAM. Certainly.

Mr. PRINCE. Does each bottle have to be blown by a human being blowing it?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRINCE. You have no machinery by which you can gage the blow?

Mr. GRAHAM. No.

Mr. PRINCE. That is the point I wanted to ascertain.

Mr. GRAHAM. Third, because food products are not sold on a weight or measure basis, but in packages so put up as to sell at a certain convenient retail price, as for 5 cents or some multiple of five.

Fourth. Because it tends to destroy the value of individual label and packages which have obtained a recognized standing among consumers and are copyrighted as special designs.

Fifth. Because such language is not properly part of a food law and not necessary since the packages are sold as such without any claim of weight or bulk.

Sixth. Because the language of subdivision "Fourth," page 21, fully protects purchasers from fraud and deception, not only as to weight and measure but in all respects, by prohibiting any label which may be false or misleading in any particular.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, speaking to this amendment, I desire to call the attention of the House, and especially of gentlemen from California, to the fact that the legislature of the State of California, in the exercise of its police authority, passed a law similar to this amendment, and that the supreme court of California, in a recent case, that of Robert Dietrich, decided that act to be unconstitutional. If the State within its own border can not undertake to prescribe this sort of a police regulation, then surely the Congress, which has no right to exercise police powers within a State, can not do it. I send a statement of the decision to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

MAY SELL BUTTER WITHOUT MARK ON LABEL—ROBERT DIETRICH, CHARGED WITH VIOLATION OF A RECENT LAW, WINS IN THE SUPREME COURT.

The supreme court yesterday discharged Robert Dietrich, a grocer, from the custody of the sheriff, where he was placed some time ago for the violation of a recently enacted law providing for the marking of packages of butter containing less than 6 pounds or more than one-half pound—in other words, the statute requiring the exact weight to be printed on packages of butter for sale is declared unconstitutional and void by that body.

Some time ago Dietrich was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment for disposing of butter on which the exact weight was not printed. Immediately afterwards Dietrich applied for a writ of habeas corpus. As a result of this decision, dealers will be allowed to sell quantities of butter which have been put up in any shape that they may desire without marking their weight—in fact, according to the holding of the court, a dealer may continue, if he is so inclined, to use the short-weight system, whereby the customer will get much the worse of the deal.

The court holds with the petitioner that the law mentioned is unconstitutional, on the ground that it is an unwarranted restriction on the citizen's constitutional right to his property. In rendering the decision, which affects every retailer of butter in the city, Justices Shaw and Sloss added dissenting opinions to that prepared by Justice McFarland.

The general decision of the court was rendered on the principle that the legislature can not impose an onerous and unnecessary burden upon property and business and the right of contract, except when this may be done under police power for the protection of the public health, morals, and safety.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the dissenting opinion only undertook to say that it could be done under the police power of the State. The majority opinion held that it could not be done at all. Now, I should like to know under what authority Congress acts in enacting a law of this sort? Probably Congress can prohibit the transportation of articles by means of interstate commerce. Congress has no right to undertake to enforce a police regulation like this. Surely, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if the State can not within its own borders enact a law of this character, as is sought to be done in this bill, with reference to the size and weight of packages, Congress goes far beyond its authority when it undertakes to do it.

[Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. FLOOD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me that the only possible justification we can have for passing legislation of this kind, which will necessarily revolutionize the trade customs in many industries, is the prevention of fraud upon the purchaser and consumer. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] last night gave us a demonstration of different sizes of cans and packages. I submit that any good housewife can discover the difference in the sizes without the quantity being printed on the packages at all.

Mr. MANN. But the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] was unable to distinguish the sizes, even after a careful examination and comparison.

Mr. HAYES. Then I submit that there is no prohibition in the law which prevents the purchaser putting the package on the scales and determining its weight. But I believe that any housewife will very soon discover which is the larger can or package.

There are many instances where goods, like crackers, are put up in packages, where it would not only be almost impossible, but utterly useless to burden the producer and dealer by a provision of this kind, because the package speaks for itself. So with many other things.

I submit that the amendment of the gentleman from New York covers every possible need for legislation of this kind. If the weight or the quantity is stated on the package, then it should be correctly stated, but I can see no possible object in requiring every industry in this country that puts up goods in packages to state on the outside of the package the weight or quantity. It would not only revolutionize the trade in many industries, but would be a very onerous requirement upon almost all of them. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from New York will be carried.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I first yield to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. BURTON] to allow him to speak in his own time.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, since this matter has been before Congress I have received a great many letters from constituents in my district, interested in the canning business, and all agree that such a thing as absolute accuracy in weight or measure is an impossibility, or, at least, without weighing each package, and this would entail so much expense that it would make the industry unprofitable. I agree with the gentleman from New York that the thing we are most interested in is to give the people pure food, and not to legislate as to the exactness of the quantities that they shall get in a package.

In order that the committee may understand the feeling of the people in my district, I ask permission to have read from the Clerk's desk a letter from Hon. Walter O. Hoffecker, a former Member of this House.

The Clerk read as follows:

J. H. HOFFECKER CANNING COMPANY,
Smyrna, Del., March 31, 1906.

Hon. H. R. BURTON, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Concerning the pure-food bill passed by the Senate February 21 last and now before the House, beg to call your attention to section 7, subdivision 3, page 21, reading as follows: "If in package form, the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package," it will be misbranded. As president of the Tri-State Packers' Association, which organization embraces the leading canners of the States of New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, and the eastern shore of Virginia as members thereof, I write you earnestly soliciting that you will use your best endeavors and influence to have this part or section of the bill either eliminated or made not applicable to canned goods. This provision, if enforced, would entail a great hardship on canned-goods packers, for the reason that nearly all canned goods of every description are filled automatically by machinery, and as there is no uniformity in the conditions of raw material, at least as applied to many articles preserved in tin, there can be no absolute uniformity in weight. Take tomatoes, for instance. You are doubtless well aware that there is nothing less uniform in weight than tomatoes. When the season is dry one condition prevails, and when it is wet an entirely different condition is present. Different growers, even in the same neighborhood, bring a different quality of fruit to the cannery, and if the tomato shall be pulpy, it will fill the can full, but will not weigh as heavily as the can well filled with tomatoes that are more juicy. To compel the packers to weigh every can is practically impossible. They have the greatest difficulty already to procure sufficient help to take care of the crop, and if they were obliged to weigh each can it would result in a greatly diminished pack and untold amount of trouble and expense to the packer, a greatly increased cost to the consumer, and no possible advantage to anyone.

Canned goods are never slack filled. No matter what the contents may be, the can is always full, and this is surely all any consumer can reasonably demand. The variation in weight, of course, is slight, and yet it exists in every factory for the reasons above given. If there is no deception to the consumer, why impose such a hardship on the canner as to oblige him to weigh every can and have labels with different weights for the same size can? It would be just as reasonable to require the merchant selling eggs to have them all exactly uniform in size and weight.

Another practical impossibility without untold trouble and expense to the merchant dealing in eggs in large quantities. The trade have regulated the size of can and demand full cans, and canned goods are invariably sold by sample, and no packer does, because he could not afford to, slack fill his cans.

You will confer a great favor upon your constituents in the canning business, and you are doubtless aware of the enormous size of this industry in Delaware, Delaware being the fourth State in the Union in the extent of her tomato canning, by having this objectionable feature eliminated from this pure-food bill. We, as canners, are heartily in favor of a pure-food bill, but of course we do not want one that imposes needless hardships with no corresponding benefits.

Sincerely hoping that as packers we may have your earnest and hearty cooperation in this matter, I am,

Very truly, yours, W. O. HOFFECKER.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Delaware has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the time of the gentleman from Delaware be extended one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. Mr. Chairman, it is a very easy matter for men to say that the objection on the part of the canners to striking out this paragraph of the proposed law is because they are disposed to cheat. The letter I have just read is from a man I know personally, once representing my State in this House. He is president of the Tri-State Packers' Association, from the three States of Maryland, Delaware, and New Jersey, and I know that he would not make a statement he did not believe to be absolutely correct. He says it is impossible to make uniform-weight cans and packages, and now, Mr. Chairman, I took the trouble to weigh two cans of tomatoes, cans I have no doubt made at the same factory and put up in the State of Maryland, one at Vienna and the other at Rising Sun, and there was nearly one-quarter of a pound difference in weight between the two cans. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. All of the gentlemen from whom I have had communications agree that they are in favor of a national pure-food law, showing by that sentiment that they have no disposition to pack unwholesome or impure food products, and therefore it can not be said that they are in opposition to the principles of this bill, but they are unwilling to be compelled to incur such an expense as would make their business unprofitable. There is no doubt of the fact that a very large part of the pack of 1906 has been sold, based upon the cost of previous production, and, in some instances, with a guaranty of the goods being packed in the same way as heretofore; and it is no more than fair that such pure-food law as may be passed upon this particular subject at least shall not apply to goods packed prior to January 1, 1907.

Now, it is my judgment that a uniform standard of cans should be in some way adopted for this whole country, and that packages should be made, as nearly as possible, of uniform size, and marked Nos. 1, 2, 3, etc., as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] in his proposed amendment. But in all probability the cans for the pack of 1906 and the greater part of 1907 have been contracted for and in many cases manufactured, and a law compelling that a uniform standard to date earlier than from January 1, 1907, would render worthless thousands of the cans that have been manufactured in good faith and stored ready for use.

These cans are all made by machinery, and from an examination that I have made of the packages that have been before this House it is very clearly shown that the different States have classes of machinery which, while they may be uniform for that particular State, differ in size from those manufactured in other States.

Congress will undoubtedly in the future enact a law for cans of uniform size throughout the country, and I would suggest that notice be given through the Department of Agriculture that such a law would be advocated by that Department, in order that the manufacturers of tin cans throughout the country might be prepared for what certainly will, and of right should, be enacted into law.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I am friendly to this bill and expect to vote for it. I believe we should put forth every reasonable effort to suppress fraud, and at the same time I favor and shall vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN], because I believe it is adequate and meets the conditions. We should aim to destroy affirmative frauds. I believe that the people of the United States are competent to buy intelligently a 10-cent can of tomatoes or of peaches. If we prohibit the publication on the can of a misstatement, we can trust to the intelligence of the people to trade for a can of tomatoes as well as we can to trade for a mule or a horse. We might as well require the height of a horse to be branded upon him as to require the weight to be branded on a can of tomatoes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Then, will the gentleman explain how it happens, in all these cans which are exhibited before us, they are a little less than they appear to be? A can you would suppose to be a 2-pound can, comes a little under it; a 1-pound can, a little under 1 pound. That goes all through these packages; they are a little bit less than the purchaser would suppose they contained. Would the gentleman think that was a coincidence or an accident?

Mr. TALBOTT. If the gentleman from Tennessee will permit, I will answer. The weight marked on those cans is placed there by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do not mean the weights at all. I mean you take the cans of tomatoes and the cans of peaches, and they all have a little less than anyone would suppose they contained.

Mr. TALBOTT. Is the weight stamped on the cans?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce extracted any part of the contents of the cans?

Mr. TALBOTT. I mean to say that with all the canned goods—tomatoes, corn, peaches, and everything—as they come from the packer, there is no weight stated on them.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. TALBOTT. If any fraud has been perpetrated upon the people, it is by the dealer—the retailer—and not by the canner.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The canner made it possible for him to perpetrate the fraud by putting up a can that was apparently not what it actually was; putting up what appears to be a 2-pound can when it weighs less than 2 pounds.

Mr. TALBOTT. The canner helps to do nothing of the kind. The canner bought a standard can, and filled it with tomatoes or peas or corn and put it on the market, and if anybody has been cheated it is by the retailer.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Then why isn't the canner willing to put upon the can that it is a standard can?

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman will understand that the canning season in this country for all kinds of goods is only from four to six weeks, depending on the climate.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. That has no connection with this question. Why isn't he willing to label the cans "No. 1 can," "No. 2 can?"

Mr. TALBOTT. Hasn't the customer got eyes so that he can see? Does not the purchaser buy with his eyes open?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why is not the canner willing to state the truth?

Mr. TALBOTT. The canner can not make those statements and be accurate about them.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Why do not the canners want to tell the truth?

Mr. TALBOTT. They do want to tell the truth.

Mr. PADGETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I want to state in answer to the question put by the gentleman from Washington that these cans do not purport to state how much the contents weigh. The cans do not affirmatively deceive anybody. I say that the people are competent to judge of the weight and the size of a can of tomatoes or a can of corn as much as they are to purchase a horse or a mule or a cow, or anything of that kind in the markets of the country. We might as well require the age of a horse to be stamped on his shoulder and his size and height in hands plainly marked on his side, as to require the weight of each can of tomatoes or each can of corn to be stamped on the can.

Mr. ADAMSON. When we reach the stage which we are doubtless rapidly approaching, the Government will indicate and regulate the mule and horse trade when it performs its paternalistic duty, and establish regulations for that matter.

Mr. MANN. Well, it would save a good deal of swindling in the gentleman's country if they would regulate the mule trade.

Mr. PADGETT. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois I want to say that the only trade we have from his section of the country is when we go up there to buy. We never sell there, and if there is any swindling, the gentleman can see where it lies. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I thought the gentleman was going to answer me instead of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GRAHAM. Inadvertently a few moments ago, in responding to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I stated that all bottles were still blown by the human breath. I want to correct that statement. There are now inventions whereby machine-blown bottles are made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not discover any question of privilege in what the gentleman has stated.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given sufficient time to retract all of his statements. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may proceed by unanimous consent, but he certainly has not as yet stated any question of privilege.

Mr. GRAHAM. The machine now injects the air into the bottle, and that machine——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not stating a question of privilege. He is out of order unless he is permitted to proceed by unanimous consent.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may proceed long enough to make his remarks entirely correct. I ask unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his colleague may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that although in making that answer I was inadvertently mistaken, yet the force of my argument is the same, because this machine varies the same as the human breath. The operator may have that air which penetrates the bottle of a little greater force, and thus make the glass therefore lighter.

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, some breaths are stronger than others. [Laughter.]

Mr. WACHTER. And is it not also true that the amount of glass taken up for the bottle varies in different cases?

Mr. GRAHAM. That is also correct.

Mr. LAMAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have read the following letter, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to have a letter read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

APALACHICOLA, FLA., May 9, 1906.

Hon. W. B. LAMAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The undersigned, who is engaged in the packing business in the district represented by you in Congress, respectfully calls your attention to subsection 3 of section 7 of the pure-food bill, which applies to canned goods and reads as follows:

"If in package form the quantity of the contents of the package be not plainly and correctly stated in terms of weight or measure on the outside of the package."

The adoption of this would mean that each can of fruit or oysters packed by us would have to be separately weighed and the quantity of its contents stamped on the outside of the same, an entirely impracticable procedure, which would benefit no one and render a successful management of our business almost impossible.

There is no objection to the pure-food bill if it guarantees to the consumer what its name implies; but this section would not accomplish the purpose sought, and its adoption would mean a serious menace to this important industry in your district.

Yours, respectfully, JOHN G. RUGE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I wish the gentleman would not do that.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not mean to close debate now, but I wish merely to fix a time.

Mr. MANN. All of the debate on this amendment has been on the gentleman's side so far.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going to say in thirty minutes, which was to be under the control of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but if the gentleman does not desire such a motion made I shall not make it.

Mr. HOWELL of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SHERMAN]. It has been clearly established that it is impracticable in the process of canning fruits and vegetables to obtain a uniformity of weight in each can. Now, I concede that the object sought by the committee—to prevent imposition and deception upon the public—is entirely praiseworthy, but I am constrained to hold the opinion that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] underrates the intelligence of the American consumer. The manufacturer of reputable goods of full measure and superior quality has no fear of an unscrupulous competitor who stints his measure and disregards the quality of his goods. His ways will find him out and bring about his undoing. The honest, reputable canning establishment will triumphantly survive and drive out of the market all such dishonest concerns.

The consumer can easily protect himself against short weight and similar deceptions without the aid of this legislation. I have received many protests from the manufacturers of canned goods protesting against this provision of the bill. Tomatoes and fruits are canned in large quantities in my State. The companies engaged in this industry are all conducting a strictly honorable business, and in a large degree contribute to the general prosperity. Their product has won a high standard of excellence, and they are jealous and watchful of their standing and reputation. They know better than those not familiar with the practical business what is an obstacle and a hardship upon them. It is manifestly unwise to hamper and annoy these beneficial and necessary industries. This legislation has grown out of a demand for protection to the public health rather than to guard the pocketbook. Its paramount object is and ought to be the prohibition of deleterious and injurious foods and drugs. The public are helpless against the artful and unscrupulous adulterations which are palmed off on them. Many of these have been shown to contain substances that are detrimental to health, and much fraud and deception has been practiced upon the people. This measure is the result of a universal demand for relief. If it meets the hopes and expectations of its friends, which I believe it will, in purifying and rendering wholesome the foods and drugs that enter into daily consumption, its founders and promoters may well deserve the name of "benefactors."

We may not be able by this measure or any other to absolutely prevent fraud and deception, and it is a debatable question how far the Federal Government ought to enter upon this extensive and unlimited field where the end sought is purely a monetary one. It is plainly evident, however, to anyone who gives the subject a moment's consideration that the small protection to the pocketbook attempted by this provision respecting food packages is insignificant and unworthy of public consideration compared to the gross frauds and deceptions practiced upon the public in the great multitude and variety of manufactures other than food products. I hope the pending amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Is it in order at this time to offer amendments to this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order now until this amendment is disposed of.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Then I shall ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the first section and let it be considered as pending.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall object to that at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for fifteen minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment is the so-called "package amendment." The committee amendment is one which will require that all packages be either labeled with the quantity of the contents in the way of weight or measure or else under regulations established by the Secretaries of the Treasury, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and of the Department of Agriculture they shall be stamped the standard size which they purport to be. Most canned goods—and this controversy seems to center around the canned-goods proposition—are in standard-size packages. Cans are known as No. 1, No. 1 tall, No. 1½, No. 2, No. 2½, and No. 3. They are not sold by the trade as 1-pound, 2-pound, 3-pound cans, etc., although, in the very circular letter which the canners have sent to us, they refer to these cans as 1-pound, 2-pound, and 3-pound size cans, and, as I read to the House the other day, they are not only advertised by the stores as 1-pound, 2-pound, and 3-pound cans, but commonly are called by the storekeepers as such. If there were no variation, it would make but little difference whether they were marked or not. If the cans were all made true to the standard size, so far as canned goods are concerned, there would be no occasion for this amendment, but as I wish to endeavor to demonstrate to this committee that in No. 3 size cans, for instance—and I take that size simply for illustration—there is a variation in the size of the cans, a variation intended to defraud the purchaser, a variation intended to save to the producer by limiting the quantity that is put in the cans.

And the proposition which is submitted from the committee upon this question is far more for the protection of the honest producer, the honest canner, than it is for anybody else, because it enables him to put up his goods in standard-size cans, knowing that some less honest canner shall not offer his cans, purporting to be No. 3 and containing less, at a less price.

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to yield to questions, but I beg to say to the House that I have asked for as little time as I thought I could get along with. If I have any time left, I am perfectly willing to yield to questions then. Now, for instance, here are two cans [exhibiting], each marked "tomatoes." This can is sold for a 3-pound can—not marked 3-pound can; none is so marked—packed by a Baltimore firm. The weight of it is 2 pounds 5½ ounces.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How will the customer know the groceryman's scales are correct?

Mr. MANN. All I can say about these scales is that they are furnished by the Bureau of Standards as being correct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois how will the customer know that the scales of the groceryman are correct?

Mr. MANN. These are not scales in the other groceryman's place; these are scales supplied by the Bureau of Standards of the Government. If the gentleman will permit me to proceed with my illustration, I will be very greatly obliged. That can, as it stands, as I say, contains 2 pounds 5½ ounces. It is a 3-pound can, supposedly. Now, gentlemen constantly say that these cans vary in weight, according to the quantity of the contents, according to the thickness of the contents; that some tomatoes weigh more than others. Very well, we will try water and see how much this will weigh. It is very evident I have not opened the can until now. [Filling can with water.] Now, filled with water, and not full, it weighs——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Is that pure water?

Mr. MANN. More than it does with tomatoes in it. Evidently there is a little differnce in the specific gravity between the can of tomatoes and the can of water. It was filled a little fuller with water, but practically the same.

Mr. CROMER. How much did it weigh with the water?

Mr. MANN. Practically the same, but a trifle more. It is fair to say to the House that none of these cans is filled quite full; undoubtedly there is a little difference in favor of the specific gravity of tomatoes. They are a trifle heavier, but none of these cans in my observation has yet been filled full with any article. Now, that is no reflection upon the article, because of course all canners and all gentlemen understand it is absolutely impossible to have any of these cans filled full of any of these articles, because they are filled with heated material and there is a shrinkage after they are cooled. But that was a can of tomatoes made in Baltimore; a No. 3 size can. It weighed 2 pounds 5½ ounces. Now, I have a can that weighs 2 pounds 9½ ounces, the same number can——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Where is it made?

Mr. MANN (continuing). New Jersey. So far as standard size is concerned, this one is standard size. The smaller can is not No. 3 standard size. That can was a fraud upon somebody. It purported to be a No. 3 can, and it was not a No. 3 can. It was sold for a No. 3 can and was not a No. 3 can.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman weigh the empty can?

Mr. MANN. I will in a minute if the gentleman will pardon me. Now, the difference between these two cans was a quarter of a pound. Gentlemen, see that this can filled with water weighs more than the can of tomatoes. The specific gravity of the two is practically the same. Now, the gentleman wants the cans weighed. [After weighing the can.] That can weighs six ounces and a quarter, or a trifle more. [After weighing the other can.] That can weighs five ounces and a half.

Mr. SHERLEY. What is the difference between the weight?

Mr. MANN. The difference is three-quarters of an ounce.

Mr. WACHTER. Are they both the same sized can?

Mr. MANN. No; I said that one was a smaller-sized can than the other.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. You said that one was a fraud, and now you say that one of them is not.

Mr. MANN. One of them is a real No. 3 standard size, and the other purports to be a No. 3 standard size can, bought in the trade for a No. 3 standard size, but it is not. Now, I am sorry that the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] for the moment is absent.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman permit a question? Is the 3-pound standard size supposed to be a 3-pound can?

Mr. MANN. A 3-pound standard size is not supposed to be a 3-pound can. The 3-pound standard size weighs, gross, including the weight of the can, about 2 pounds 10 ounces. There is a variation from 2 pounds 9½ ounces sometimes to 2 pounds and 11 ounces. It does depend somewhat, not upon the specific gravity, because that is almost the same as water, but a little bit upon how full the can happens to be. But while the gross weight is given as 2 pounds 10 ounces, on the average 6 ounces of that is can.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MANN. If the House will be considerate enough to extend my time a little.

Mr. MONDELL. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman what was the widest range in weight between the different cans of tomatoes he has found, in ounces—how much they differ?

Mr. MANN. I think the widest range I found in tomatoes was between 2 pounds 4½ ounces and 2 pounds 10½ ounces, gross.

Mr. MONDELL. Probably one was the standard so-called "3-pound can" and the other the so-called "2½ pound can."

Mr. MANN. Yes. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], who is quite keen of intellect—not only quite keen, but extremely so—took the trouble the other day to examine a couple of packages I had on the desk here, and after an examination and careful comparison of them, stated on the floor of the House that evidently they were the same sized cans, but that they weighed differently. [After weighing cans.] That they weigh differently is easily noticed here. Now, I should have said that possibly they were of different sizes. I am sure that no housewife by looking at them could tell whether they were of different sizes—perhaps they are the same size. I have no way of telling except by looking at them. The gentleman from New York, after a careful examination, insisted that they were the same size, and hence that the difference in weight must be on account of the contents. The only way I know of testing that is by weighing them. That may be the case. [After weighing can.] That can weighs, with the contents, 2 pounds 5½ ounces.

Mr. WACHTER. Where is that from?

Mr. MANN. That is from Maryland. [Laughter.] [After weighing the other can.] We want to give Maryland her due. There is one that weighs 2 pounds 3½ ounces. That is the only instance, I may say to my beloved friend from Maryland, where I found that the Maryland goods weighed more than the goods from the other States. And, wishing to give Maryland the benefit of any doubt, I make the illustration. That [indicating] is a Maryland can that weighs 2 pounds 5½ ounces, the other weighs 2 pounds 3½ ounces. The difference may be in the weight of the can, for all I know. [Weighing the can.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be given such further time as he desires.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to take that. I will take ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. One of those cans with the contents weighed 2 pounds 5½ ounces and the other weighed 2 pounds 3½ ounces, and the difference in the weight of the cans is one-half ounce.

The difference in the weight of the contents was 1½ ounces. One and one-half ounces is not a great deal, but a considerable difference in these cans. [Pouring water into the can.] Already a great deal more than there was by weight. Gentlemen can see. I weighed the cans, and the can is filled a little too full of water. A can full of water weighs considerably more than a can purporting to be filled with fruit. Now, in this case I find there is no appreciable difference in the weight of the contents of the can with water and the same can when filled with fruit. These were marked "extra heavy sirup," these fruits; and these were peaches, and the weight of the contents in extra heavy sirup was half an ounce more than the same with water.

Mr. LACEY. May not steam bubbles have accounted for the difference?

Mr. MANN. Of course, as I stated before to the gentleman, no one complains because the cans are not filled level full with fruit, because it is impossible. The cans are filled full of the article when heated, and that is as full as they can be filled and solder them up, properly enough. A gentleman made the statement here the other day that there was a difference of 6 ounces in the weight of the same class of article, depending upon whether it was new or old. I wish to say to the House that there is not a difference of 1 ounce in weight in the contents of a can, whether it is new peas or old peas. You can take new peas that are perfectly fresh and juicy, and can them, and then take a can of old peas, and fill the can with water, and there is not a difference of weight of half an ounce to the can.

The same runs through all, and I will not take up the time to open a lot more cans. But perhaps it would be better——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish to ask the gentleman a short question.

Mr. MANN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It seems that they have trouble about making these glass measures, because they have to blow them in a certain way. What is the difference between that and the one that the apothecary has, for he has an absolutely perfect one—2 and 3 ounce, and so on, vials—from which he sells, on orders, strychnine and various other medicines?

Mr. BURTON of Delaware. There never was a perfect one.

Mr. MANN. The talk about the difference in glass measures is all moonshine.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I thought so.

Mr. MANN. Of course it is impossible to make any two things in the world identically alike. That never has been done by man or God. It is not possible to make two glass bottles identically the same size, but there is practically no difference. Does anybody think here that a bottle of liquor containing a pint and a half was intended to have put into it 2 pints?

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. I can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MANN. I can not yield now, because I have not time. Now, I wish to call the House's attention to this fact: We are not asking that these canners shall stamp their standard-size can with the quantity in the can. What we ask is that authority be given by which a man should, if he uses a No. 1 standard size, stamp it "No. 1 standard size," and use a No. 1 standard size; and if he uses a No. 3 standard size, stamp it as a No. 3 standard size or put on the label "No. 3 standard size;" and if he uses No. 2, let him stamp that as No. 2 standard size. We do not ask them to do an impossibility, and I dare say that if this provision becomes law it will within eighteen months, the time that it goes into effect, be the most popular legislation with the legitimate canners that was ever put upon the statute books. [Applause.] Why should a man who is using a No. 3 standard size can to put up tomatoes be forced into competition with a man who uses a short-weight can for the benefit of the department stores, for the benefit of the mail-order houses, in competition with the legitimate trade? We do not ask an impossibility; we ask a fair thing for the fair producer and the fair thing for the purchaser and the customer, and I think if gentlemen fail to adopt this amendment at this time they will all regret it, and, in my judgment, if it should not become a law at this session of Congress it will not be long before the people will demand an even more stringent provision. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from New York will not prevail.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Just a word. I think the particular amendment of the gentleman from New York ought to be discussed for just one moment, so this committee can judge as to its effect. It provides, if I heard it read correctly, that where goods are labeled as to weight or measure, the weight or measure of the goods in the package shall be correct, under penalty of being misbranded. The effect of that would be, as to canned goods, that there would be no weight or measure at all placed upon any canned package in the United States. That provision really would prohibit such statement, for the reason that these cans are made not for weight or measure, but in standard sizes. They are not made to be sold for weight or measure, and could not be labeled as to weight or measure, but they would be sold by weight and measure just the same.

There is nothing in this bill to prohibit just exactly what these canners ask for in this circular, the privilege of calling their standard-size cans weight cans and selling them as they do now to be worked off on the public as cans sold by weight. They would not label them weight cans, they would not have to label them weight cans, but they would sell them for weight cans. The dealer would advertise them as weight cans to the public just exactly as they do now. The department stores, the catalogue houses would advertise them in the great newspapers as cans of so much weight and as holding so much goods. The public would buy them as weight cans, just as they do now. Yet they would be standard cans under the size of the standard without any label to inform the public of the swindle, just as now. The amendment of the gentleman from New York would allow that kind of a fraud to be perpetrated, and would rather encourage and legalize it because furnishing a cover for its perpetrators, and for that reason ought not to be in this bill.

Mr. CROMER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois, if there is a can known to the trade as a "standard," why do you seek in your amendment to compel the man who uses the standard can, and who, according to your construction, is honest, to go to the trouble of labeling his can? Why not compel the men who use other than the standard cans to label their cans?

Mr. MANN. All we propose to do is to have him label it "Standard can," so that they will know whether it is standard or not.

Mr. CROMER. That is the trouble——

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is not the slightest trouble about printing on a label "Standard No. 1," any more than there is in printing a picture of a peach.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 97, noes 52.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. MANN.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 112, noes 45.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the pending amendment by striking out all after the first word "that" and inserting the language which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all articles of food or drugs transported into any State or Territory, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation of and effect of the laws of such State or Territory enacted in the exercise of its police powers to the same extent and in the same manner as though such food or drugs had been produced or manufactured in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages.

SEC. 2. That the term "food" as used herein shall include all articles used for food, drink, confectionery, or condiment by man or other animals, whether simple, mixed, or compound. That the term "drugs" shall include all medicines and preparations recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary for internal or external use, and any substance or mixture of substances intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease of either man or other animals.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the proposition submitted by the minority in the views which they have presented.

Gentlemen on this floor have expressed solicitude about prohibition States, and have declared a willingness to have the law so enacted that the prohibition sentiment in those States may be respected and their laws enforced.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this simply enlarges the provisions in the bill enacted in this Congress some years ago, relating entirely to the liquor question, and provides that as to all food and drugs, whenever they have reached the confines of a State, they shall be subject to the laws of that State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if we could emasculate every section in this bill, as we have just emasculated the one about weights and measures, the whole bill would go to the country as a piece of waste paper, of no effect and no harm to anybody, and doing nobody any good, except those who are seeking to break down local regulations, in the insane cry for uniformity. Under that amendment, if a man professes nothing, of course he has nothing to perform, and the section is left ridiculous.

The Federal Government has the power under the Constitution to see that interstate commerce runs in regular currents, in regular course of trade through all States; but when it reaches a State line, and questions of morals or of deceit or fraud are raised, the whole commerce stops, because the State and the State alone has the power and the duty to regulate questions of morality and fair dealing within the State, no matter whence the subject of complaint comes. You can not get around it at all. I invite all gentlemen who are willing to protect the laws of the prohibition States, and all gentlemen who are willing to permit fair deaing in all the States, to vote for this amendment. There is no such thing as uniformity.

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman if this amendment he proposes is what is known as the Wilson Act?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; amplified.

Mr. SHERLEY. Amplified in what respect?

Mr. ADAMSON. As to all articles.

Mr. SHERLEY. It doesn't make it apply before delivery, but after delivery.

Mr. ADAMSON. After it has been deposited inside the State, and then the fact that it comes in in the original package makes no difference.

Mr. SHERLEY. The gentleman understands that the Wilson Act as construed by the Supreme Court applies only after delivery to the consignee?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; and this applies to goods when delivered inside the State.

Mr. SHERLEY. Before delivery?

Mr. ADAMSON. I understand so.

Mr. SHERLEY. This is a copy of the bill known as the "Hepburn-Dolliver bill," extending it to other articles.

Mr. BARTLETT. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say that I drew this bill and introduced it into the House. It is a copy of the bill I drew, and it is a copy of the Wilson bill applied to food and drugs.

Mr. SHERLEY. Then it only applies after delivery to the consignee, as construed by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is the Wilson bill, except as to the subject-matter. The gentleman from Kentucky will remember that I conferred with him about it before I introduced it.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I was proceeding to make an observation on another phase of the subject, and I fear that this interruption will consume my time, and I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. I was about to speak of the idea which impels manufacturers and others to seek uniformity and to force their goods on communities contrary to regulations of those communities. I want to say that the idea of uniformity is a chimera; it is not practical in law; it is not practical throughout the confines of this great country. It is not true to nature; it is an anomaly and an abortion in nature. One star differs from another star in glory, the leaves differ, men differ, all things differ. The notions of things and the people in the different States differ. The fundamental ideas of honesty and fair dealing differ among different people in different sections, and it takes all these things to make a great country like this. I say to you again, what the States object to is not that the people are unable to attend to their own business and not that the folks are unable to legislate for their own protection in a State like half a dozen I could name, which show themselves able to take care of themselves and do not want the interference of other people. They object to the effort on the part of Congress to force into them contrary to their laws, contrary to their interests, contrary to their ideas of right and justice, commodities and goods that are calculated to deceive and rob and swindle.

I know of a great many States in which the people instead of asking Congress to help them to protect the morals and lives and health of the people ask only that other people let them alone; that their right under the Constitution be recognized to protect themselves from folks in other communities and prevent them from injuring, violating, and overriding local rights and local intelligent common sense. This country is only made up of aggregated intelligence and honesty of the people, and anybody who deprecates the virtue and intelligence of his own State and appeals to these Halls to seek superior intelligence and honesty from the Federal Government in the administration of the affairs of his people, derogates from the character of his people and degrades the State in which he lives. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state for the information of the committee that while this is not a substitute technically, it is in effect, and the Chair will treat it as pending and will not put the question on it until amendments affecting the bill have been acted upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understood the gentleman from Georgia to offer an amendment, and I understood the Chair yesterday to state that amendments would be considered as offered. I suppose they are open to discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment is a substitute, and it is an amendment to strike out the entire paragraph. Under the rules, before the question is put on that amendment, amendments seeking to perfect the text will first be put to the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the word "ingredients," line 25, page 21, "and that does not conflict with any of the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of this bill."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, there were something over 105,000,000 gallons of imitation whisky disposed of, consumed, and sold in the United States last year. A little over 2,000,000 gallons of whisky in its original integrity was consumed by the people of the United States. The United States census declares the most of that 105,000,000 gallons to be made of "neutral spirits and drugs." I have always been, as I took occasion to say briefly yesterday, an earnest advocate of the pure-food bill. I am equally that to-day, and I desire above all things else to avoid any discrimination in this bill against any food products, either in mislabeling or adulteration.

I desire that there shall be no discrimination as to the application of adulteration or misbranding any product included in the food list. We have no justification in conscience or law to make a rule in this bill that applies to one food product and not to another. My amendment is simple and plain and easily understood. It is, on the twenty-fifth line, page 21, of the bill, after the word "ingredients," to add "and that does not conflict with any of the provisions of sections 6 and 7 of this bill."

If we mean to do what is consistent with the spirit of this bill—if we mean not to exclude any subject-matter in this bill under the definition of food, under which whisky is included—then we will adopt this amendment, and for this reason: That as the bill now stands, in the provision for "blend," in lines 23 and 24, page 21, "not excluding harmless coloring and flavoring ingredients," it stands as a provision palpably and intentionally in conflict with the definition that is given of adulterated and misbranded food in the first clause of the bill as to adulterated food. It reads (page 19, line 5):

If any substance has been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

Second. If any substance has been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

Fourth. If it be mixed, colored, powdered, coated, or stained in a manner whereby damage or inferiority is concealed.

Now, with reference to "misbranded" in this bill as defined, the provision as to blending conflicts directly with the first paragraph of the subdivision on page 20:

If it be an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article.

Second. If it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, or purport to be a foreign product when not so.

I desire, Mr. Chairman, to make a practical illustration of this. Let us take, for example, an empty quart bottle and put in it one thimbleful of 8-year-old whisky, and set beside it another quart bottle filled with 8-year-old whisky. You have, then, in one bottle one thimbleful of 8-year-old whisky and in the other quart bottle sitting beside it a full quart of 8-year-old whisky. What does the "rectifier" do? He takes a half pint of fresh new whisky, right from the still and puts it into the quart bottle that contains the thimbleful of 8-year-old whisky. Thus far he has complied with the law in blending "like substances." Then he puts in his different chemicals and drugs, his oils, his prune juice, his flavoring or rye essence, his bead, and his aging chemicals, and with those things, between sunset and sunrise, he makes his blended whisky and marks it "Eight-year-old whisky," "Pure old Kentucky whisky," and it goes to the whole country as a genuine straight product.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WANGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that he regards the drugs and oils to which he has referred as like substances to whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No; I did not say that. I say that when you put the half pint of fresh whisky just come from the still into the quart bottle where the thimbleful of 8-year old whisky is, you have got "like substances blended." Then you have, under the provisions of this bill, on line 24, page 21, to put in your "harmless coloring and flavoring ingredients"—that is to say, the rectifier gets his oil of Bourbon from Ohio, his prune juice from New York, his bead oil from Massachusetts, and aging oil from Michigan, and with the thimbleful of real whisky and the half pint of fresh whisky he in a few hours turns out a full quart of his imitation whisky. That is what you want put in, and that is what you make up the balance of the quart of whisky with, and that is what makes these 105,000,000 of gallons of whisky that the census pronounces "neutralized spirits and drugs."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. Does the gentleman regard these oils and drugs as harmless articles?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do; but as imitation, and as deceiving the public, and intended to deceive by being misbranded and adulterated.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It makes counterfeit whisky.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Because they mix a half pint of fresh new whisky with a thimbleful of old whisky, and that is "blending like substances." Then they put the coloring and the flavoring matter in, giving it age, flavor, and smoothness, and the next morning they mark it "pure whisky," "whisky 8 years old." There is where the imitation comes in. Why do you not want to apply to this great product of whisky the same standard that you apply to labeling foods and to misbranding foods? What is the reason for it? Ah, Mr. Chairman, there is the test.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How do you propose to stop it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. By simply making it conform with the provisions of the bill that I have pointed out as to adulterated and misbranded goods. If it be labeled or branded so as to deceive or mislead the purchaser, if it has those concomitants in it, if it is new fresh whisky and one thimbleful of 8-year-old whisky and has this oil and caramel with prune juice and various other ingredients unknown to anyone, let them mark it as such. You have never heard yet of a bottled-in-bond whisky man undertaking to mark his whisky in imitation of the spurious and "neutral spirits" whisky. Oh, no; it is the neutral spirits dealer who marks and brands his in imitation of the bottled-in-bond whisky.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How do you want this whisky marked so that you can tell it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to have it marked as "blended whisky," and stating the ingredients in plain and simple terms—that is, what the blended whisky consists of. That is all. If a man wants to drink it, let him do it. I am trying to make the whisky man put the truth on the barrel, as we require them to label the different foods and medicines correctly. That is the broad and comprehensive meaning of this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And the gentleman is also trying to protect the real 8-year-old whisky.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; I am trying to protect that of which the Government gives a guaranty of its purity—the bond and bottle whisky, or any other whisky that is straight and correct.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. This very section provides that they shall plainly indicate blends or imitations.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Pure whisky is as white as water, is it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And the coloring that is in the whisky, the red liquor, as it is called, comes from the charred inside of oak barrels, does it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Well, that is supposed to be the fact—that is, you put in the charred barrel the original product that comes from the still—ethyl alcohol and secondary products.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The white whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; and it stays in there for four years under the bottle and bond law, and it gets from the charred barrels certain colorings and certain flavoring that never can be acquired in any other way.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I desire to ask this question: If you put this whisky—that is, the original white whisky—in a barrel and it gets its coloring from the oak barrel, what difference does it make if some other harmless coloring substance is put in the whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Because it is an imitation. Why are you not willing to mark it on the barrel just exactly what it is, regardless of whether what has been added to it is "harmless" or not?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would have everything marked if I was drawing the law; but I am asking you the question, What is the difference in principle between the white whisky colored with the charred oak barrel and the same whisky colored with something else that is harmless?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Simply it is different; that by keeping it in the charred barrel four years it acquires age, color, and flavor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a different proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It acquires age and color, and the other is an imitation and put off on the public as being the true and genuine article, made by flavorings and colorings that are harmless.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask for five minutes for the gentleman, so I can ask him a question.

Mr. STANLEY. I want to answer the question of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The color of whisky is an indicia to its quality and its age.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I understand that.

Mr. STANLEY. You put your white whisky into a charred oak barrel, and you can not go there the next day and draw out red liquor; you can not go there the next month and draw out liquor with a proper color; you can not go there the next year and draw it out.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, I will tell you what I am willing to do. I am willing to vote for a proposition to put a label on the whisky barrel so it will tell how old it is.

Mr. STANLEY. I am with you.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But I do not see why it hurts whisky to put harmless color or sweetening into it. My own judgment about that is that the more harmless color and sweetening matter you get into it the less damage the whisky is going to do, because you are not getting so much whisky. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. But you would rather have surely a pure article, if you want to drink it, than an imitation. You do not want to have all of these drugs, prune juice, extracts, etc., as the census report calls it, and probably a little wood alcohol thrown in for good measure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why can not you reach the object you are after by requiring these people to put on the bottle, the jug, or barrel the age of the whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. And the other concomitants of the whisky, or substantially so, sufficient at least to inform a purchaser what he is drinking.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What are the other concomitants?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Why, the aging oil, the prune juice, the rye essence, the bead—these are some of the coloring ingredients that enter into this imitation whisky.

Mr. DE ARMOND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman from Alabama, his objection to the coloring is put upon this ground, that in the regular way whisky can be only colored in an oak cask after years of being there. That by using coloring matter whisky can be colored in an hour in imitation so as to deceive the buyer. Do I understand the gentleman correctly?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is exactly correct—that between sunset and sunrise they will bring out next morning, with all these concomitants of coloring matter, flavoring, etc., a barrel of whisky, that they mark on the head of it "Pure Kentucky whisky, age 10 years."

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, will the gentleman tell the House at what period of time the coloring of whisky by the charred barrel became the regular method of doing that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Oh, I do not know, Mr. Chairman. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it has a great deal——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that there are good, reputable gentlemen engaged in this business because it is allowed, and all I ask of this pure-food bill is that when you go to sell me anything you put the right name on the barrel or the jug, so I can tell what I am drinking; and I will tell you further than that——

Mr. BARTLETT. Your amendment virtually would mean that you would not have any other kind of whisky except what we call whisky bottled in bond?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Not at all; it does not mean that, nor lead that way.

Mr. BARTLETT. I differ with the gentleman. I want to know if the gentleman is not aware that the blend and rectification of whisky is as much under the guidance and certification of the Government as the bottled whisky?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. No. I think not, for as I said in my remarks yesterday, the committee that reported the bottled-in-bond act said it was an assurance to the purchaser of purity.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is not familiar with the statute of the States, then.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I think I am. I simply differ with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. One of your propositions is that a whisky that is made in twelve hours should not be labeled whisky that is 8 years old?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is it. I have stated it plainly.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That is one of the frauds that ought to be stopped. Does not whisky get red with age?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Yes; it acquires an amber color.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And you want to protect that?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I do. And the rectifiers give it a flavor by beading of some kind, with something like soap, and they put it in and mark it, and put it out to the country for 8-year-old whisky. I am simply contending, Mr. Chairman, if you please, for a truthful declaration by label or other mark, and I do not think any discrimination should be made in this bill between this great product and any other food product.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not expect this amendment to come from a member of the committee, because I understood that the committee was agreed upon that point.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If the gentleman from Georgia will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I will say that I told him a few minutes ago, sitting right there, that I intended to offer this amendment and I offered it with the full knowledge and consent of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, because I objected to the proposition in the committee. I told the gentleman that, sitting right there.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir; you did. That is the first time I had heard of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You heard it then.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes, sir; I did. That was the first time I heard of it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. You heard it then.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; I did. Mr. Chairman, I made that statement and I adhere to it. In connection with this amendment now offered, if adopted it will destroy that provision in the bill, which permits harmless coloring or flavoring ingredients to be added to whisky when blended or rectified. I will say that the whole effort behind the pure-food bill, as it was begun and continued, has been a contest between the bottled-in-bond whisky people and those who are rectifiers or who produce blended whisky, the bottled-in-bond whisky people insisting that no one ought to be permitted to sell whisky except themselves, claiming that they are the only manufacturers of good whisky or pure whisky. I have not the time to detain the House with a discussion as to the merits or demerits of the one or the other. Both are bad enough. I do know that each one of them, both the bottled-in-bond and the blended or rectified whisky, contains poisonous substances, and I do know that rectified or blended whisky as hereafter made and offered for sale under the provisions of this bill when it becomes a law will be no more injurious than the bottled-in-bond whisky, the best of it, because under this bill, if it becomes a law, the blender will have to take two whiskies of the same character—that is, straight whiskies—and blend them together, either by reducing their proof or adding to them harmless ingredients or coloring matter, or by doing both.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] just now stated that the Government of the United States did not take the same care with reference to inspection of rectifiers and blenders as it does to the original manufacturer of whisky. I beg to call the attention of the House to sections 3317, 3318, 3319, and 3320 of the Revised Statutes, and to various other statutes, and to the constructions that have been put upon them by the Treasury Department, in which all care is observed to prevent fraud or the introduction of impurities. Not a step can be taken by the rectifier or by the blender which is not under Government supervision. And the effort here made to ostracise one kind of whisky and put the Government stamp of approval on another ought not to find its way into an alleged pure-food bill.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] just now stated that this bill, in the shape in which presented, permitted a man to take a thimbleful of old whisky and fill up the balance of the vessel with new whisky and call it whisky eight years old, and put it upon the market as eight-year-old whisky and sell it. Is that true?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not think it is. But under the provisions of this bill you can not do it, because every section it is proposed to amend defines what a blend is—that is, a blend is the mixing of two similar substances, two similar kinds of whiskies—and the amendment that was put upon it provided that if you add to it harmless ingredients for flavoring and coloring it should not be against the provision that defines blending. The Senate bill defined "blending" to be the combining of two similar substances. I offered the amendment in the committee, and it was agreed to by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which permits the use of "harmless coloring and flavoring ingredients," and if the pending amendment is adopted it will virtually emasculate that provision and destroy the business of the manufacturers of blended and rectified whiskies. A word in reference to the character of blended whisky, Mr. Chairman, and I am through. All whisky, when originally distilled, is white or colorless.

Now, anybody who has the idea that the color of whisky comes from age is not informed on that subject. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] asked about that. You may take whisky and put it in glass for years, and it would still be white. It gains neither color nor flavor by age. These qualities are acquired from the way it is treated or kept.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Delano, under date of September 16, 1869, which may be found in Volume X, Internal-Revenue Records, page 121, rendered a decision, from which I quote the following extracts:

> To mix any material with distilled spirits, wine, or other liquor, which does not result in producing either a spurious imitation or compound liquor, is not rectification.
>
> To determine whether the mixing is rectification or not under this clause of the statute, you must therefore look to the result to see whether either of the three kinds of liquors named is manufactured by the mixing. A spurious liquor is an imitation of and held out to be genuine.
> An imitation liquor is one that is an imitation of the genuine and held out as such imitation.
>
> A compound liquor is any liquor composed of two or more kinds of spirits mixed with any material which changes the original character of either so as to produce a different kind as known by the trade.
>
> It follows, therefore, that the mixing of liquors identical in kind as known by the trade does not constitute rectification.
> For instance, a party may mix a material with spirits, wine, or other liquor, which will not produce either a spurious, imitation, or compound liquor, but such mixing is nevertheless rectification if it results in either purifying or refining the spirits, wine, or other articles thus mixed.

From the foregoing it is apparent that a compound liquor is neither a spurious nor an imitation liquor, and that rectified whisky is neither a spurious, an imitation, nor a compound liquor.

What is described as "compound liquor" is known in the trade and applied to whisky as a "blend," which usually includes the addition of harmless flavoring and coloring matter.

A mixed whisky is a mixture of two straight whiskies, without the addition of anything else, and a rectified whisky is a whisky made by freeing the high wines from fusel oil and adding thereto coloring and flavoring.

There is as much governmental inspection and supervision, if not more, thrown around the business of the rectifier, blender, and wholesale liquor dealer as there is around the business of the distiller.

Section 3319, Revised Statutes of the United States, limits the persons from whom a rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer may purchase distilled spirits. Penalty, $1,000.

Section 3317a, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that when a rectifier expects to rectify or compound distilled spirits he shall, before emptying any package of distilled spirits for that purpose, give notice in duplicate to the collector, and submit such package for the inspection of the United States gauger, who weighs, gauges, and makes return thereof to the collector.

Section 3320, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that when a package is filled on the premises of a rectifier it shall first be inspected and gauged by a United States gauger, who shall affix a stamp thereto, etc.

Section 3318, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended, provides that every rectifier and wholesale liquor dealer shall provide a book, to be kept in a form prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and that he shall on the same day on which he receives any spirits, and before he touches them or alters them in any way, enter in such book the name of the persons or firm from whom, and where received, by whom distilled, rectified, or compounded, and when and by whom inspected, the number of wine and proof gallons, the kind of spirits, and the number and kind of stamps thereon; and before he sends any spirits away from his premises he shall make similar entries, thus keeping a perfect account with the Government of everything which he receives in and everything which he sends out. He is, furthermore, required to keep this book open for inspection, and on or before the 10th day of each month he must send to the collector a transcript covering the preceding month. Any false entry or failure to keep the book is severely punished.

Section 3277, Revised Statutes of the United States, requires rectifiers to furnish facilities to internal-revenue officers to examine and gauge any vessel or utensil on the premises, and to supply all the necessary assistance for inspecting the premises, stocks, and apparatus applying to such persons, and for that purpose he must open all doors, boxes, packages, and casks for examination under a heavy penalty.

Section 3456, Revised Statutes of the United States, provides that if any rectifier or wholesale liquor dealer fails to do any of the things required by law or does anything prohibited by law and no specific punishment is mentioned by any other provision, he shall pay a penalty of $1,000 and forfeit all the liquors owned by him or in which he may have any interest.

There are about 1,000 real rectifying houses, and a Government gauger is assigned to each, and in addition there is quite a large number of special agents and assistants who continually inspect these places.

By reference to these sections it is apparent that it is not possible for him to do any of the disreputable things which have been charged to him and to which my friend from Alabama has called attention.

Mr. Chairman, everybody who has studied the question knows that blended or rectified whisky is no more injurious than straight or bottled-in-bond whisky—that the coloring of whisky does not come from age, but that it comes from ingredients added to it, or it comes from the barrel or from the wood in which it is placed. It is not dependent on the age but on the coloring matters which are added to it or which it extracts from the wood; and I will not vote to destroy one legitimate business in order to build up another—certainly not to establish a whisky trust. That is all I desire to say on this subject. [Loud applause.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I ask the House to permit me to be heard half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a moment. Without objection, the gentleman may proceed for one minute.

There was no objection.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not know anything about the "age" of whisky. I do not know anything about making whisky.

The CHAIRMAN. There is but little more than an hour left to the committee, and no business will be done until we have order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will bear with me, I shall endeavor to tell what little I may know in regard to the manufacture of whisky, in order that I may aid the committee in voting intelligently on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Whatever may be the difference of opinion as to the wisdom of this bill among Members, I presume that all men here are a unit in the desire that if we have a pure-food law, its purpose and result shall be purity of food and drugs rather than discrimination against competitors in trade. [Applause.] The reason I am on my feet to speak on this matter is because there has been a persistent attempt on the part of certain Members in the whisky trade to use the Congress of the United States to legislate them into prosperity and their competitors out of prosperity. To make legal their particular method of manufacture and to make illegal other particular methods of manufacture.

Now, there is on the statute books to-day an act known as the "bottled-in-bond" act. It gives peculiar advantages to the distiller, against which not one word of complaint has been had; but when, not satisfied with that act, they undertake to proscribe every man who does not put his whisky out to the public under the "bottled-in-bond" process as being a fraudulent dealer, it is proper to protest. I stated to the gentleman yesterday; and he has had twenty-four hours to take up the challenge, that if he could show me a line on the statute books that went to secure the wholesomeness or purity of whisky, in the true sense of the word purity, I would support an amendment such as he has offered, and he has not yet shown it to me.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The strongest reference that I made then and can make now is the guaranty of an act of Congress saying that that whisky bottled in bond was a pure whisky.

Mr. SHERLEY. There is not anything in the bottling-in-bond act that says that. If one of the pages will bring me the bottle of Overholt whisky on the table there, I can state to the House what the green stamp does say. It carries some six things to the knowledge of the purchaser. It carries the knowledge that a certain distiller manufactured it. It carries the knowledge that the distillery is located in a certain internal-revenue district. It carries the knowledge that the whisky was made at a certain time, that it was bottled at a certain time, that it is a certain proof, that the tax of $1.10 was paid on it, that nothing has been added after distillation but water, and that is all it does guarantee. Now, what makes the purity of whisky, and how is it made? Whisky may be made out of corn, rye, barley, and various other grains. Its quality depends largely upon the quality of the grain, the quality of the yeast, the cleanliness of the mash tubs, etc., and the proper distillation. There is not one line of the internal-revenue law that looks to an inspection of the grain to see whether it is a pure grain or a musty grain; not a line which looks to see whether the culture of the yeast be a proper culture, or whether it contains bacteria which are harmful. There is not a line to say that when the whisky is distilled it is properly distilled, so as to get rid of the first run or the last run over, which contain the worst elements in whisky.

There has been a lot of talk about neutral spirits, about cologne spirits, as if that was some bugaboo to scare people. Those who know anything about the manufacture of whisky know that the purest ingredient in it is the neutral or cologne spirits. It constitutes from 98 to 99 per cent of all whisky of full proof, and it is absolutely pure. It contains the medicinal property in whisky. The more of ethyl alcohol, which is the neutral spirit, you have in whisky, and the less of fusel oil, the purer whisky you have.

Now, in the old days, before the internal-revenue tax came into existence, whisky was made by distilling neutral spirits from the grain and afterwards adding coloring or flavoring matter. The Kentucky whisky was shipped to Cincinnati, then the great market—sent there as white whisky and then colored and flavored to suit the purchaser. But subsequently it was discovered that by putting it in a charred barrel the whisky would, in the course of time, take a color and flavor; that the flavor increased and the color increased with age. In other words, they discovered another process of adding to the whisky coloring and flavor. Instead of adding the coloring and flavor directly by putting caramel in it to flavor and adding coloring matter to suit the public taste, they added these by taking a white-oak barrel, charring that barrel, and from the tannin of the oak and the char of the barrel they would get the flavor and color. Now, under the bottling-in-bond act, whisky has to stay in the warehouse four years before it can be bottled. There is no guaranty to any man who buys bottled-in-bond whisky that he is getting a high-grade whisky, that the grain out of which it has been made has been properly selected, that the yeast is a proper yeast, that the distillation has been proper. Under existing law it is absolutely possible to take whisky made at the time when the beer vats are sour, and the whisky itself is sour and musty, so mean that the slop of it would hardly be drank by cattle, and to run that into a barrel at the distillery, roll that barrel into a registered warehouse, let it stay there four years, bring it out, bottle the whisky under the seal of the United States Government, and impose it upon the public as pure whisky. If you wanted to legislate for purity, you ought to undo instead of piling up more law. There is not a "bottled-in-bond" man who does not advertise "the Government guarantees the purity of my whisky. See the green stamp of Uncle Sam." And yet, in point of fact, he knows that the only guaranty is that the whisky has gone through the distillery into the warehouse and has been bottled without anything else added. Now, the thing added may or may not improve the whisky. In this connection I want to say that there is a great distinction between fine blended whisky and what is popularly called "rectified whisky." There is a great misuse of the term "rectifying," which has become, in the mouths of some gentlemen, something fearful. Yet what does it mean? To make right; to purify. That was the original and true meaning of the word "rectification."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If the gentleman will pardon me, the gentleman said that we used very flippantly the word "rectify," and that it was a great bugaboo. The gentleman will let me read to him section 3244 of the Revised Statutes, and then tell me if he thinks he is right:

> Every person who shall, by mixing such spirits, wine, or other liquid with any materials, manufacture any spurious, imitation, or compound liquors for sale under the name of whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, spirits, cordials, or wine bitters, or any other name, is to be regarded as a rectifier and as being engaged in the business of rectifying.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has illustrated extreme fairness by reading one-half of the law. Now, in order that we may have all of the law, I will read not from a circular, but from the Revised Statutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I read all that portion that applied to the rectifying.

Mr. SHERLEY. All that applied to your contention. I do not mean to say that the gentleman did it intentionally, but the gentleman has been supplied with a lot of misinformation by people who have an object, and he has been made the unconscious means of giving to the House false information.

Here is the law which defines what a rectifier is:

> Every person who rectifies, purifies, or refines distilled spirits or wines by any process other than by original and continuous distillation from mash, wort, or wash, through continuous closed vessels and pipes, until the manufacture thereof is complete, and every wholesale or retail liquor dealer who has in his possession any still or leach tub, or who keeps any other apparatus for the purpose of refining in any manner distilled spirits, and every person who, without rectifying, purifying, or refining distilled spirits—

Now comes the part which the gentleman read—> shall, by mixing such spirits, wine, or other liquor with any materials, manufacture any spurious, imitation, or compound liquors for sale under the name of whisky, brandy, gin, rum, wine, spirits, cordials, or wine bitters, or any other name, shall be regarded as a rectifier and as being engaged in the business of rectifying.

Now, what was the purpose of that act? Was it for the purpose of branding one particular man as engaged in a legitimate pursuit and another as engaged in an illigitimate pursuit? Not at all. The purpose was to collect $200 from a rectifier who rectified a certain quantity and $100 if he rectified a smaller quantity. That was the sole purpose. It was a fiscal law, not a law undertaking to define purity. It classifies a great many people engaged in a great many different occupations. A high-class blender stands just as high in the trade and is just as honorable and high class a man as is the distiller. The trouble with the public generally is that it has the impression that whisky must be one way in order to be whisky. The gentleman would have Congress legislate the exclusive use of the word "whisky" to a process that has not been in existence much more than fifty years, and it would put out of existence and deny the use of the word "whisky" to the makers of whisky by processes that have existed over one hundred and fifty years. It is to that sort of legislation under the name of "pure food" that I object. If you want to have a real regulation of the whisky business, have the Government inspect the grain when it goes into and is ground in the hopper; have the Government inspect the yeast and see that it is pure; have it inspect the vats; have it inspect the sanitary condition of the distillery and the warehouses, and then if you have the proper kind of a distiller, a man who knows his business, you may get a pure whisky, but you will not get it by virtue of any law that is now in force. This matter has been thrashed out in committee——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. It was thrashed out more thoroughly in committee than it possibly can be here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman not think it is a fraud for a man to sell whisky that is only two years old as whisky that is eight year old?

Mr. SHERLEY. Unquestionably.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How are you going to stop that?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is not anything in this act that will warrant a man selling whisky immediately made as six-year old whisky. There are a lot of things which are and ought to be prohibited. We do not desire, however, to compel one man to put on his label things that will carry to the popular mind the idea that his whisky is impure, using the word "impurity" now in its rightful sense, and to have another man, who may have the greatest of impurity in his whisky, simply because the manufacture has been by a different process, exempted from telling the public. The thing that is poisonous in whisky is the fusel oil. It may be in bottled-in-bond whisky and usually is in bottled-in-bond whisky in a higher percentage than it is in properly blended whisky.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I will ask the committee to give the gentleman further time if he will allow me to ask him another question.

Mr. SHERLEY. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I would like to read to the gentleman the definition of the supreme court of Kentucky as to what a rectifier is. That is the gentleman's own State and the supreme court of that State. They say:

> The proof shows that the rectifiers and blenders take a barrel of whisky and draw off a large part of it, filling it with water, and then adding spirits or other chemicals to make it proof and to give it age, bead, etc. The proof also shows that from 50 to 75 per cent of the whisky sold in the United States is blended whisky. It is a cheaper article, and there is a temptation to simulate the more expensive whisky.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kentucky may proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what he has to say to that definition.

Mr. SHERLEY. I have no special dispute with the definition. It is true that rectifiers do put in cologne spirits or neutral spirits, an article purer than the whisky itself. It is also true that some rectifiers make bad whisky. It is also true that some bottled in bond whisky is bad whisky. I am not contending that one class are all saints and the other all sinners. It is that position that I object to in the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]. He undertakes to ascribe virtue to one class and to deny it to another.

In conclusion, I desire to say that this committee has worked days and weeks on this matter. They have had full hearings in regard to the matter, and there was not a subject canvassed more fully than this subject was. The committee has brought in its bill in its wisdom, and I maintain that this Committee of the Whole can follow with better judgment the wisdom of the whole Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce than it can the wisdom of one member of that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. STANLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that debate on this paragraph is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not make that point of order. The debate on this is very important, and there has but one side of this question been discussed during all that time.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not like to——

Mr. STANLEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me five minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will not object to the gentleman from Kentucky addressing the House for five minutes. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will not object to the gentleman from Kentucky addressing the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. Chairman, in the limited time of five minutes it would be impossible to answer the gentleman who has epitomized all the arguments of the skilled attorneys for the rectifiers of whisky that have ever been uttered before this or any other committee. [Applause.] I want to say to you in the beginning that I will not make the confession that the gentleman from Kentucky has made that this is a trade war between two aspiring sets of distillers, and that I defend one of them. This is not a contest between two makers of whisky. I represent no special interest.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman mean to imply that I stand here as the representative of any special interest?

Mr. STANLEY. Not at all. I take your word for what you say.

Mr. SHERLEY. All right.

Mr. STANLEY. I mean to imply you admit this is a conflict between two special interests, one of whom you defend.

Mr. RYAN. And the other you espouse.

Mr. STANLEY. No, sir. I stand here in the name of the health of the American people; in the name of honesty in business; just as much for honest whisky as for honest everything else.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STANLEY. No; I do not yield to anybody. [Applause.] I want to say this, that I have no objection to a man blending two kinds of whisky, but I do object to his making any kind of whisky "while you wait." Here is a quart of alcohol, 100 proof strong. It will eat the intestines out of a coyote. It will make a howling dervish out of an anchorite. It will make a rabbit spit in a bulldog's face. It is pure alcohol, and under the skill of the rectifier he will put in a little coloring matter and then a little bead oil [illustrating]. I drop that in it. Then I get a little essence of Bourbon whisky, and there is no connoisseur in this House who can tell that hellish concoction from the genuine article; and that is what I denounce. [Applause.] I say that the coloring matter is not harmful; I say that the caramels are not harmful; but I say that the body, the stock, of the whisky I made is rank alcohol, and when it gets into a man it is pure hell. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STANLEY. I decline to yield; I can not answer a twenty-minute speech in five minutes and carry on a colloquy. I say to the gentlemen of this House that no man is so ignorant that he does not know that there is nothing purer than alcohol. Alcohol 100 proof can be made out of rotten potatoes; it can be made out of a garbage barrel; it can be made out of a dead body, or anything else that will decay. Being pure it must not be implied that it is not harmful. Raw alcohol and new whisky are deleterious to the health of every man who drinks them; and by the adding of coloring and flavoring matter these substances are falsely sold as old whisky by the rectifier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for five minutes.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more, and that I may have five minutes on this amendment.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Charman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

Mr. MANN. I think that the request comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] was seeking recognition for a division, a divsion will be had.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 34, nays 76.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, now I desire to offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LAWRENCE] offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of the second committee amendment the following: "Provided, however, That dental preparations not made for public use, sale, or consumption, nor designed nor intended to be injected into the system, or used for internal ingestion into the stomach of human beings, but used for treating cavities in teeth and allaying the pain thereof, when sold direct to registered dentists, or through dental depots, for dental purposes, are exempt from the provisions of this act.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Chairman, I shall occupy the attention of the committee but a moment. This is an amendment which I introduce at the request of a constituent who is a physician and who manufactures a remedy used in dental practice. He feels that an injustice will be worked if he is obliged to publish the formula of his remedy, and he writes me as follows:

The pure-food bill as reported contains this provision: "That for the purposes of this act an article shall be deemed to be misbranded if it fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol therein, or of any opium, cocaine, or other poisonous substance which may be contained therein."

Every drug I use in my preparations is a "poisonous substance" if ingested into the stomach. But my remedies are not used in that manner. They are made for, and can only be used by, dentists and dental supply houses. They are not sold to the public. My preparations contain some of the prohibited drugs. If I am compelled to make my formulas public, they will be imitated; and since inexperienced hands can not properly compound them, the desired effect will not be produced. The public, instead of being benefited, will be injured. My remedy, properly compounded, saves the teeth and also saves the patient from spending so much time in the dental chair. The pure-food bill, as I understand it, is to safeguard the public health where the public eat, drink, and ingest different substances into the stomach, both for food and drugs.

My remedies are for a different purpose—are not to be ingested into the stomach. Let me add that my remedies are not made for public use, sale, or consumption, but are employed only by physicians and dentists.

Mr. Chairman, I very heartily approve of the pending bill. The committee having it in its charge has done splendid work, and I shall vote for it with great pleasure. I am confident that its passage is demanded in the public interest. I wish, however, to ask the gentleman from Illinois if the committee carefully considered this feature, and if he can not accept the amendment I have offered to the bill? Will it not prevent such a hardship as the gentleman whose letter I have read calls attention to?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the matter is not at all new to the committee. We all had communications from the same gentleman. There was some justice in his complaint in reference to the statement as to all "poisonous substances," but that has been eliminated by the amendment which was adopted yesterday; and the only provision in the bill as it now stands affecting the gentleman's remedy is the requirement that there shall be stated upon the package the amount of cocaine contained therein. This remedy contains cocaine. It is true it is not for internal use. On the other hand, I consulted with a large number of dentists in reference to this matter, and they invariably told me that in their judgment every package which was made for their use containing cocaine ought to have on it the name "cocaine," with the quantity, so that in using it they would know that they were using it and how much. [Applause.] I therefore hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CROMER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at end of section 12: "Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as repealing, modifying, or changing chapter 728 of the Acts of Congress, approved August 8, 1890."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. MANN] if this amendment would not be satisfactory?

Mr. MANN. Let me ask the gentleman from Iowa if the section he quotes is the original Wilson law in reference to the transportation of liquor?

Mr. LACEY. It is the original Wilson law.

Mr. MANN. Then the amendment is perfectly acceptable to me, and I hope it will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 17, amend by striking out the words between the word "aforesaid," in line 10, and the word "after," in line 17.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I will read the whole sentence, and show what I want to strike out:

Any party so notified shall be given an opportunity to be heard, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed as aforesaid, and if it appears that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such party, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article, duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer.

My motion is to strike out all after the word "aforesaid" down to and including the word "officer," at the end of the sentence.

One of two things is true about the part I move to strike out. Either it is absolutely no good whatever, and has no efficacy to it or common sense in it, or it is undertaking to make a certificate of the Secretary of Agriculture and his analyst to be used by the district attorney as evidence against a man in a criminal court, where he is defendant against a criminal charge, and that is against the Constitution of the United States, and against the constitution of every State in the Union. I am unwilling to be a party to stultifying myself and the House of Representative and the entire American Congress by putting into this bill a thing that every man who ever poked his head inside of a criminal court knows is unconstitutional, and it is preposterous. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken as to what would be the meaning of the language of the act. The provision of the bill requires that after the Secretary of Agriculture has made an examination and has given the defendant an opportunity to be heard, that if in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture there has been a violation of the law, he shall certify his opinion and the results of the analysis to the proper district attorney as a foundation for the district attorney to commence proper prosecution. What else would the Secretary of Agriculture do with his findings? For what purpose do we have it required that in place of commencing a prosecution in the district in which the article is found we have an examination first made by the Secretary of Agriculture, and if in the opinion of the authorities here there have been adulterations or misbranding, then he refers it to the district attorney, and he furnishes the district attorney his opinion? That opinion is not a matter of evidence at all. It is the basis upon which the district attorney proceeds; and instead of being, as the gentleman from Missouri would suggest, in violation of the rights of the person, it saves the rights of the person by requiring that before he shall be prosecuted the matter shall pass through the hands of the law officer and also through the hands of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. KEIFER. Let me suggest there is no provision in the bill that makes the certificate evidence in a criminal prosecution.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What do they send it for, then?

Mr. KEIFER. They send it there as information, so that he may institute proceedings.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. It can not be made evidence against him before a jury.

Mr. GAINES of West Virginia. If my colleague will permit me, I will state to the gentleman from Missouri that it is for the purpose of saving the man from factious suits at the hands of petty officials.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 12, page 25, by striking out lines 15 to 20, inclusive.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 18537) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the amendment of the Senate No. 29, had agreed to the conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. PROCTOR, Mr. HANSBROUGH, and Mr. SIMMONS as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 19844) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. BERRY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18750) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6483. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a pontoon railway bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien, and to authorize the construction of a similar bridge at or near Clinton, Iowa; and

S. 6448. An act to authorize the Grand Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows of the District of Columbia to sell, hold, and convey certain real estate.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible in five minutes to satisfy anybody on the question of the power of Congress to exclude from the channels of interstate commerce impure food. For myself I have no doubt that the power exists under that clause of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to regulate commerce. I have no doubt of the wisdom of the exercise of that power. I have no doubt that the power to inspect the food is a necessary power in the execution of the power conferred. I voted upon that principle for the meat-inspection law recently in this session of Congress. But, Mr. Chairman, this power has its clear limitations—as definite as the power itself; and I voted against the quarantine bill, because I conceived that section 7 of that law carries the Federal power beyond its just limitations; and I conceive that section 12 of this bill is far more vicious and subject to the contention made then on section 7 of the quarantine law.

Now, gentlemen who have not read this—and doubtless there are many who have not—I invite your attention to section 12, and I invite your attention to the word "but" and the words following, and I invite your attention to the word "except" and the words following as a limitation upon the character of the declaration in the words of the first three lines. After the first three lines declaring that "This act shall not be construed to interfere with commerce wholly internal in any State nor with the exercise of their police powers by the several States," there is a limitation.

But—

Says these other lines—

But foods and drugs fully complying with all the provisions of this act shall not be interfered with by the authorities of the several States when transported from one State to another so long as they remain in original unbroken packages, except as may be otherwise defined by law or provided by statutes of the United States.

This asserts the direct proposition that if any article begins an interstate journey that such package transported and delivered and its carriage terminated as an interstate-commerce transaction may, because of its form and size and its color or its weight, be still hedged about by the Federal power and the police power of the State absolutely suspended so long as the condition of the package is not changed. I say that is illogical, contrary to every theory of our Government, and ought not to get into this bill; and I am not saying this now as a captious objector to pure-food legislation, because I am in favor of the main provisions of this bill.

More than that, the words beginning with the word "except" assert the power of Congress to legislate in the future over such unbroken packages within a State and destroy and nullify the State's authority in such cases. This is a monstrous doctrine, subversive of all the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and destructive of the police powers of the States. I can not support the bill if this language remains in it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief. The gentleman says he opposes this provision for the same reason that he opposed the provisions of section 7 of the quarantine bill, which passed the House by an overwhelming majority of both sides. The same reason for the quarantine bill applies to this provision. As amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, it unquestionably does not affect the whisky trade or the oleomargarine trade between States, and I can see no objection to it, except the old bugbear of States rights, which some of my genial friends from Texas have not received by instruction, but by inheritance.

I ask for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] will be adopted. There are some of us here who may have old-fashioned ideas, but whether we have or have not, we can and will vote for this bill if this amendment is adopted, and we can not vote for it if it is not adopted.

The gentleman draws an analogy between this provision which we wish to strike out and that in the quarantine bill. There is positively none. The quarantine bill provided that after a train had been inspected and found to be free of disease, and the commodities and passengers upon it had been inspected, that it could be carried on through and beyond a State which had State quarantine laws against yellow fever into a State that had none; and this bill provides that this original package may be carried into the State and landed there, regardless of the laws of the State, whatever they may be.

Mr. BURGESS. I do not wish the gentleman to misunderstand me. I agree with him that there was room for disagreement among Democrats as to section 7, but there is no room for difference as to this section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am answering the argument made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The gentleman from Illinois said that the provision in the quarantine bill was the same as this.

Mr. BURGESS. That is not the case.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And he said there was the same reason for it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Illinois stated that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] was opposed to this provision for the same reason that he was opposed to section 7 in the quarantine bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then allow me, who on this floor defended section 7 of the quarantine bill to the best of my poor ability as perfectly constitutional and within the power of the Federal Government, to say that it bore no sort of analogy to this provision, and that whereas that was, in my opinion, constitutional, this is, in my opinion, obnoxious to the charge of violating the spirit if not the letter of the Federal Constitution.

The Federal Government has a right to regulate interstate commerce. It has no right to land anything in a State which is contrary, in the opinion of the State authorities, to the public health, the public morals, or the public policy in that State. The difference between the two is this: The Federal Government has absolute and plenary power in connection with the regulation of interstate commerce up to, but not beyond the point where it strikes the reserved police powers of the States. In the quarantine bill nothing was attempted to be done except to protect a train engaged in interstate-commerce transit across a State until it got to a State that had no law against its stopping. This undertakes to protect the article itself in being landed in the State; and I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] can prevail, if for no other reason than the old one our ancestors gave when they first passed the law for the toleration of religion, "out of regard for tender consciences." [Applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is not in order at this time. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make the point of order that debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a vote; but wish to say that if this amendment should be adopted it would prevent, for instance, the city of St, Louis from furnishing southern Illinois——

The CHAIRMAN. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Indiana to make the point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make the point of order that debate on this amendment is exhausted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 42, noes 90.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Provided, That goods sold under an established distinctive or descriptive term shall not be deemed misbranded if label correctly and fully and plainly describes the goods."

Mr. SOUTHARD. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to prevent the manufacture and sale or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, etc. This bill is not intended to interfere with any legitimate industry, is not intended to prevent or interfere with long-established trade conditions where they do not result in any injury, deception, or fraud on or against the public, and I want to call your attention to one or two paragraphs in this bill.

Section 7 provides that the term "misbranded" used herein shall apply to all drugs or articles of food or articles which enter into the composition of food, the package or label of which shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or substances contained in such article, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular.

Now, on the next page, beginning at line 13, it says:

In the case of mixtures or compounds which may be now or from time to time hereafter known as "articles of food" under their own distinctive names, and not an imitation of or offered for sale under the distinctive name of another article, if the name be accompanied on the same label or brand with a statement of the place where said article has been manufactured or produced.

Now I want to call your attention to the situation where a great wrong may be done if this amendment is not adopted. It is this: There are a large number of articles manufactured and sold under distinctive names and titles where no fraud or injury is occasioned by such manufacture and sale. To give one instance or illustration, here is an article called "cold cream." It has been manufactured for more than twenty years under that name of "cold cream." Everybody knows, every lady in the land who has perhaps used more or less of it knows, that it is not cream, and yet "cold cream" is the distinctive name of this manufactured article. I say everybody knows; almost everybody knows that that is so. Now, gentlemen know that no fraud is possible by the sale of this article under that name. Everybody that uses it knows it, and nobody can use it without knowing it. The trade has been established for twenty years or more, perhaps. This name has become the property of the men who manufacture it. It is as much their property as anything they own. And yet the manufacturer will be refused, he will be denied, hereafter the use of this name as applied to this article, provided this bill is passed in its present shape.

This proposed amendment, which I will read again—

Provided, That the goods sold under an established, distinctive term shall not be deemed misbranded if the label correctly, fully, and plainly describes the goods—would allow this article and articles of a similar nature to be sold under their distinctive names.

This bill is for the purpose of preventing fraud and deception in the manufacture and sale of goods so far as we have jurisdiction to do it under the provisions of the Constitution under which we are operating.

With this amendment it will be impossible for any fraud or deception to be practiced, because upon the label it must be shown correctly, fully, and plainly what the goods are. I know the gentleman from Illinois will say that you might sell potted lamb for potted ham. That is probably true, but if anybody undertook to sell potted lamb for potted ham, and the ingredients of this package containing the potted lamb were plainly marked on the package, I venture to say that there would be a very slow sale for potted lamb—such a case may be conceivable, but in practice it would never happen.

Take another illustration. We will say a man has sold for twenty years and has built up a business in "Highland cream," or any other article sold under a distinctive name which might be considered misleading as to the ingredients of which it is composed. Cream may not be the predominant element of its manufacture, and might be considered objectionable under the provisions of this bill. It would be false in that particular, as described in one of these sections, and yet no fraud has been intended, none has been committed, and, under the provisions of this amendment, if adopted, none would be possible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is in the interest of a particular brand of condensed cream. It was presented to the committee, and it was at one time agreed upon by the committee because at first it looked somewhat harmless.

Mr. SOUTHARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not understand him to say that I am presenting this amendment in the interest of any particular firm or person.

Mr. MANN. I did not say the gentleman presented it in the interest of anybody. The amendment is not new; we have been familiar with it for months. It was at one time agreed upon by the committee.

But when we began to see the scope of the amendment, we saw that if that amendment went into the bill you might as well not pass the bill. I give this one illustration which I gave the gentleman, but he did not give it correctly. I did not say that potted lamb might be sold for potted ham; but I said that potted lamb was sold for potted chicken, and that by his amendment they could continue to sell potted lamb for potted chicken, putting on one side in large letters "potted chicken" and on the back of the package, in letters so small that you can hardly see them "This article is made out of good quality of lamb."

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Does not this amendment provide that the labels shall state correctly, fully, and plainly the contents?

Mr. MANN. Why certainly, it provides that you can say one thing on the package and then turn around and say that that is false. What is the use of telling one thing on the package and saying in another place that it is false? That is what the amendment provides.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "receive," in line 3, page 15, insert the words "for commercial purposes."

Mr. WILLIAM W. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me its attention I think I can show that this amendment ought to be adopted. The object of this legislation is to protect the consumers of the country against impure and misbranded foods and drugs as made by manufacturers and as handled by dealers. As this first section is now written in the bill, if a constituent of mine should order a bottle of medicine from another State, or should order a case of canned goods for his own use, and he should receive them in my State, if such medicine or goods are misbranded or impure under this bill, then the consumer who gets them, not for the purpose of trade, not for the purpose of sale, but for his own use, is guilty of a misdemeanor and indictable under this first section. I do not object to punishing the manufacturers of impure and fraudulent goods. I do not object to punishing the dealers who knowingly handle them; but why should you punish a consumer who buys for himself, for his own use, and not for the purposes of trade, such articles from another State?

In this day, when the magazines and newspapers advertise so many foods and drugs, and when the individual consumers buy so many articles of that character from distant cities, why should you make the innocent victims of impositions guilty of misdemeanor? As this section now reads, anyone who "shall receive in any State or Territory, or the District of Columbia, from any other State or Territory," etc., is guilty of a misdemeanor. I propose, after "receive," to put "for commercial purposes."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any objection to the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and for the information of the courts," in line 22, page 22.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, section 9 provides that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable for guidance of the officials in charge of the administration of the food laws and for the information of the courts, and to determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to the foods. The objection I have is to the language "and for the information of the courts," which would seem to imply that the standards fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture shall constitute the basis for indictment and criminal prosecution; that they shall be the basis for the penal provisions of the law. I do not believe that any officer of this Government ought to have the power, by rules and regulations, to enact penal and criminal statutes, and that must be the effect of this provision. Why should the section say "and for the information of the courts?" The court is not composed of the judge as an individual. It is an institution composed of the judge and the jury, if it be a jury case, while sitting officially for the discharge of judicial functions, and the only meaning that can be given to this phrase in the section is that it shall be the basis upon which the question of crimes under the statute shall be determined.

If an individual is charged with having violated the provisions of the law, the question is not open for him, the question of fact, to be tried by the jury; but if the Secretary of Agriculture has certified that certain things are not up to the standard fixed or certain things are not wholesome, the whole question of fact is foreclosed. It is not open for determination by the court or jury.

Mr. HINSHAW. The gentleman does not believe that the certificate of the Secretary of Agriculture could be introduced in evidence as such and be conclusive as to the crime?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This section undertakes to make it the basis of the crime. We have many bills pending, and we have passed some, authorizing the heads of Departments to make rules and regulations and imposing penalties, fines, and imprisonment upon any person who violates the rules and regulations. This comes within that same class of legislation. I do not believe under the Federal Constitution that any Department officer has the right to prescribe regulations which shall be the basis of penal prosecutions, but this section undertakes to confer that right. I do not see what other purpose this language could serve in the bill. If it were for the information of the United States attorney, it would be proper, but it is not. It is for the information of the courts. How can the court be informed? It fixes the basis practically for the court to determine whether the man on trial is guilty or innocent, and it violates every proper conception of criminal statutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Indiana misconstrues the intent or meaning of the language. Under the proposition which we present it is desirable to have the same standard, if practicable, used in Maine that is used in California, and the same standard for Louisiana that we have in New York. There is no reason why the standard as far as practicable should not be the same. Now, we provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall fix standards in accordance with the definitions and provisions of the act; and his act in fixing the standards shall be given for the information of the courts. That does not bind a defendant as to——

Mr. PERKINS rose.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me for a moment. That does not bind a defendant as to whether it is an adulteration or misbranding, but the court has before it, as it ought to have, the national standard, so that the court understands the standard that has been fixed in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, which they are attempting to have enforced throughout the country, but the court is the final arbiter as to whether it is adulterated or misbranded under the act. Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. How can the court be informed in any way except by legal evidence. The court has no business to go outside of the evidence presented in the trial to find out what the facts are, and if this certificate is produced why is it not evidence? Why do you not make the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture evidence for the court to consider?

Mr. MANN. Because it is not necessary to do that. A certified copy of that can be introduced in evidence if this provision is put in the law.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the effect of it?

Mr. MANN. Simply that in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture the standard shall be so and so.

Mr. PERKINS. Then the opinion of the Secretary becomes evidence whether or not a man has violated the law?

Mr. MANN. It becomes evidence of the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to the standard of the article, not whether the man has violated the law. This does not give the opinion of the Secretary upon the particular thing at all. This gives information to the court as to the standard. Whether the article complied with the standard or not is a matter for the court to determine, and whether the standard is correct or not is a matter for the court to determine.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, at the end of section 16, the following words: "Provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as in any wise a limitation upon the reserved rights of the different States under their police power to deal with all food products offered for sale within such States."

During the reading,

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that amendment does not properly belong there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not tell why it should apply until it is read.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the amendment. I desire to say I am in favor of the purposes of the bill. I think it can do no possible harm to put that provision in the bill. It will be a statement upon the part of Congress that it does not intend that this bill shall operate as entering the domain of the reserved rights of the State in that regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting the words "or the Philippine Islands" after the words "foreign country," in section 1, in lines 21 and 22, on page 14, lines 2, 5, 12, and 22, on page 15, and line 1, on page 16; in section 2, in lines 15 and 16, on page 16; in section 10, in lines 5 and 14, on page 24; in section 13, in lines 2 and 3, on page 26; and in section 14, in line 20, on page 26; and by inserting the words "or Philippine" after the word "foreign," in section 1, in line 24, on page 15; in section 2, in lines 19 and 21, on page 16; and by changing section 15 so as to read:

"SEC. 15. That the term 'territory,' as used in this act, shall include Porto Rico."

Mr. PARSONS. The object of this amendment is to make this bill operative as it affects food shipped to the Philippine Islands and from the Philippine Islands, but not on food sold in the Philippine Islands. As the bill now stands, any person who manufactured food in the Philippine Islands and sold it there who did not comply with the provisions of this act would be guilty of a violation of this act. The act contains no provision for its enforcement in the Philippine Islands, and that might produce a curious result—namely, that, although we had passed a pure-food bill applicable there, and so had deprived the Philippine Commission of the right to legislate in regard to pure food, the Philippines would have a pure-food bill with no provision for its enforcement there, and instead of being a pure-food bill it would be an impure-food bill, so far as the Philippine Islands are concerned.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Could the provisions of the bill be enforced in the insular courts?

Mr. PARSONS. There is no provision here instructing any officer of the Philippine government to enforce them in the Philippine courts.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The bill does not give jurisdiction to the Philippine courts over the subject, this being a general Federal statute?

Mr. PARSONS. No; it does not.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Would your amendment do so?

Mr. PARSONS. No.

Mr. MANN. The result of the gentleman's amendment would be this: That whereas goods from the United States going to the Philippines would be required to be pure and properly branded, the goods in competition with them from Germany, England, or any other foreign power would be adulterated just as much as the people making them desired to adulterate them. I protest against making our manufacturers dealing with the Philippines send over pure goods in competition with rotten and adulterated goods from foreign countries.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PARSONS. Does not the bill as it now stands prevent the Philippine Commission from enacting a pure-food law, and will not my amendment enable it, in case foreign manufacturers do send impure foods there, to pass a pure-food bill operative there which will exclude impure foods of foreign manufacture?

Mr. MANN. The bill does not prevent the Philippine Commission from providing a method over there for the enforcement of this pure-food law in the Philippine Islands, and it would be an exceedingly good thing if they provide that method of enforcement.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of the Fifty-eighth Congress I introduced a bill, and reintroduced it at the beginning of the present Congress, which provides that every manufacturer of medicines for interstate shipment, or for use in any of the Territories of the United States, or the District of Columbia, shall place on each bottle or package of medicine a label on which shall be printed in the English language the names of the ingredients contained in such bottle or package of medicine. The bill did not require the exact proportions of the ingredients to be printed on the bottle or package unless such bottle or package contained opium or any of the preparations of opium, cocaine, or salts of cocaine or preparation of cocaine, morphine, or salts of morphine or preparation of morphine, chloral, or any of the preparations of chloral, alcohol, eucaine, or heroin; and in such cases the exact quantity or proportion of these dangerous habit-forming drugs shall be printed on the label in the English language. When the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce had under consideration what is known as the pure-food bill, I appeared before that committee and asked them to consider my bill in connection with the pure-food bill, because I thought it had a proper place in the pure-food bill. After presenting the matter to the committee, in response to the almost universal demand for some legislation on this important subject, they inserted in the pure-food bill the following provision:

If the contents of the package as originally put up shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package, or if the package fail to bear a statement on the label of the quantity or proportion of any alcohol, morphine, opium, cocaine, heroin, alpha or beta eucaine, chloroform, cannabis indica, chloral hydrate, or acetanilid, or any derivation or preparation of any of such substances contained therein: Provided, however, That it may be proven as a complete defense to any accusation or prosecution for failure to state the quantity or proportion of alcohol, as above required, that the quantity or proportion of alcohol contained in any package does not exceed the quantity or proportion prescribed by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a solvent or preservative of the active necessary constituents of the medicine or preparation in such package.

Mr. Chairman, there is no subject upon which the American people are more rapidly being awakened than on the subject of the dangers that lurk in the thousands of patent medicines that are being sold in this country to-day. The patent-medicine evil is alarming, and should challenge the attention of every thinking man who is interested in the welfare of his people and the perpetuity of his race. Before proceeding further, Mr. Chairman, it might be well for me to state to the committee the nature of the laws of other countries on this important subject.

England requires publicity in regard to all dangerous drugs in medicines, and her laws are very strict and comprehensive on the subject.

Cuba requires that all formulas of patent and proprietary medicines shall be presented to the Government, along with a quantity of the medicine proposed to be sold, for analysis, and a list of the ingredients that enter into it.

No patent or proprietary medicine can be imported into Brazil unless the formula of the medicine is attached to the bill of lading.

No patent or proprietary medicines can enter Russia except by permission of the medical department, and then only after an analysis of the preparation has been made by a Russian laboratory.

Belgium's laws on the subject are very strict, and require that the formulas of all patent or proprietary medicines shall be stated on the label of the bottle or package of medicines. You will note that Belgium requires a statement of the ingredients and their exact proportion in the compound.

Venezuela requires manufacturers to state what is in their medicines before they can be sold, unless the medicine is formally recognized by the Government authorities.

New Zealand has a law almost on all fours with Belgium's, providing that the ingredients of the bottle or package of medicine must be printed on the label, and the word "Poison" must be printed thereon when the bottle or package contains any poison.

Australia is now considering this subject, and legislation along the line proposed in this bill is likely to be enacted.

France, Germany, and Norway, all require publicity as to all dangerous habit-forming drugs contained in patent or proprietary medicines.

Of all the great civilized nations of the earth the United States is about the only one that has not a strict law on the subject of patent medicines.

The Druggists' Circular and Chemical Gazette on this subject says:

To be beaten in this respect by countries so far behind us in general civilization and progress as Russia seems anomalous. It can be explained only by the fact that the educated classes of that unfortunate country are far in advance of the masses, and have promulgated regulations on this line.

The sentiment against secret nostrums is now stirring Canada, and Earl Gray, the governor-general of Canada, not long ago was loudly applauded at a banquet of the medical faculty of McGill University for strong expressions in favor of publicity as to the contents of all secret medicines.

Nearly all other civilized countries but ours have very strict laws on the subject, which give the public the benefit of knowing the ingredients in the medicines and throw around the purchaser other valuable protections against the sale of fraudulent, worthless, and dangerous drugs.

The Proprietary Association of America, the largest organization of patent-medicine manufacturers possibly in the world, seeing the necessity of protecting the public against frauds and dangers in patent medicines, at its last meeting, in 1905, among other things, resolved:

That the legislative committee be also instructed to continue its efforts in behalf of legislation for the strictest regulation of the sale of cocaine and other narcotics and compositions or medical preparations containing the same.

The National Association of Retail Druggists, which met in Boston last year, after discussing this subject of patent-medicine frauds and dangers, resolved:

That the work of eliminating from the practice of pharmacy and medicine, as far as possible, of unethical, secret, and in some cases fraudulent and dangerous compounds, undertaken by the council on pharmacy and chemistry of the American Medical Association, be encouraged by our executive committee.

The American Pharmaceutical Association held its annual meeting in 1905 at Atlantic City, and a very competent committee of that organization reported, among other things, on this subject as follows:

The growth of the drug habit and the multiplication of its victims show no signs of abatement, and there is an increasing demand for legislation intended to lessen, and, if possible, destroy this evil. No more important subject affecting the public health is now before the public than this class of legislation to check the indiscriminate sale of narcotic drugs.

Dr. Charles H. Stowell, who is manager and treasurer of the J. C. Ayer Company, which manufactures a number of patent and proprietary medicines, read before the Proprietary Association of America, at its meeting in 1905, a very interesting paper in favor of the publication of the formulas of such medicines. The following are some of the expressions used in his paper:

We certainly believe that the trade interests of proprietary medicines will be greatly advanced if the consumer be frankly and fully told just what he is getting for his money. In every line of business but ours the proprietor urges upon the purchaser the closest examination and most thorough investigation. We believe we are justified in saying that the proprietary-medicine business is about the only business on the face of the earth where the people deliberately engage in a serious game of "blind man's buff," hoping to catch thereby something which shall prevent a possible break in the family circle. Provided your formulas will stand the searchlight of investigation, and provided you have individualized your advertising, then there is nothing to fear in giving said formulas to the public. But there is a great difference between giving the public the ingredients of a medicine and the formula of a medicine. Let us give the precise amount of ingredients in a given quantity of the finished product. If we use alcohol, let us say so. If we know our product is good, if we know it contains genuine merit, then we can safely place our case before the very best jury in the world—the highly intelligent American people.

But you will note, Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the House, that the provision now under consideration does not require manufacturers to publish the formulas of their medicines, nor even to state the contents, but only requires them to state the proportion of any opium, morphine, cocaine, or other poisonous substance contained in the bottle or package.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that this is a fair provision on its face, and it is hardly necessary to argue with a committee of intelligent men like yourselves that such a provision should pass. It simply lets the public know the proportions of these dangerous habit-forming drugs that they are taking into their systems in the shape of patent, proprietary, and nostrum medicines.

On February 11 of this year the World's Dispensary and Medical Association, manufacturers of Doctor Pierce's well-advertised remedies, occupied a full page in the Washington Star, an evening daily paper published in this city, setting forth the reasons why they had decided to give to the world the contents of their medicines. The full-page advertisement was headed with the following words in large type, to wit:

OPEN PUBLICITY IS THE BEST GUARANTY OF MERIT.

I beg to exhibit this paper and the advertisement to show what some of the patent medicine manufacturers are now doing in order to meet the almost universal demand of the people that they shall be allowed to know what is in their medicines. Let me read just a few sentences from this advertisement:

All observing people must have noticed a great sentiment in favor of using only put-up foods and medicines of known composition. It is but natural that we should have some interest in the composition of that we are expected to swallow, whether it be food, drink, or medicine. This sentiment has resulted in the introduction in the legislatures of many of the States, as also in the Congress of the United States, of bills providing for the publication of the formula or ingredients on wrappers and labels of medicines and foods put-up for general consumption.

Recognizing this growing disposition on the part of the public generally, and satisfied that the fullest publicity can only add to the well-earned reputation of his proprietary medicines, Dr. R. V. Pierce, of Buffalo, N. Y., has "taken time by the forelock," as it were, and is publishing broadcast, on each bottle wrapper, a full and complete list of all the ingredients entering into his medicines. So many "cheap John, give-away, 'free-trial-bottle'" medicines, made up of doubtful and often harmful character, are being offered to the afflicted under the most extravagant statements as to their marvelous curative properties that it behooves those in need of safe and reliable treatment to consider carefully what they take in the way of medicines; otherwise lasting injury, instead of relief and cure, is quite likely to follow.

This same firm in the same paper mentioned previously in its issue of April 6 has the following:

You can not afford to experiment with your health by accepting and taking free "trial bottles" of cheap John fake medicines, so freely given away in this country. Health is a heritage too sacred to be trifled with in that way. Take only medicines of known composition—those made after formulæ so choice that the makers take you fully into their confidence and feel that they can tell you just what you are using when you employ their medicines.

This is one of the largest patent-medicine firms in the United States, and you will note that it takes the bold position that the publication of the contents of medicines is not only not hurtful to the manufacturer in the sale of such medicines, but helpful. The argument is made sometimes by manufacturers of medicines who are afraid of the light because their medicines are worthless or dangerous that it is not fair to require them to tell the public what their medicines contain for fear that some one will counterfeit them and palm them off on the public. Doctor Kebler, of the Bureau of Chemistry, Department of Agriculture, on this subject says:

It is frequently claimed that if the composition of the various so-called "patent medicines" were made public the business would be destroyed. This is an old plea and is usually employed by those whose remedies either have little value or consist of well-known ingredients. No medicinal compound of recognized value needs to fear daylight. It is only those which are shrouded in mystery and misrepresentations that will suffer. In order to substantiate this point it is only necessary to state that the composition of a large proportion of medicinal remedies is common property and that the largest legitimate pharmaceutical manufacturers of the country to-day are making it a business policy to make known the composition of their remedies to medical practitioners.

This argument has no weight for the reason that nearly all of the medicines that are sold over the drug counter are either patented or trade-marked, which prevents any other person from manufacturing the identical medicine and selling it under the trade-marked or patented name.

The ingredients, and in many cases the exact proportions, of patent medicines are known to the chemists of the country, and these medicines can be manufactured by any of these chemists and sold to the public now, but not under the trade-marked or patented name of some other manufacturer. It will be seen that the J. C. Ayer Company and the Pierce company take this view of the question and are not averse to giving the public the contents of their medicines. Not only are these companies doing this, but among the most reputable and financially powerful pharmaceutical manufacturers in the United States, and, for that matter, in the world, are now making it a business policy to make known to the public the contents of their remedies. Notable among these large concerns are Parke, Davis & Co., Fred. K. Stearns Company, Detroit; Sharp & Dohme, Baltimore; Schieffelin & Co., New York; E. R. Squibb & Sons, New York; Fairchilds Brothers & Foster, New York; and Henry K. Wampole & Co., Philadelphia. I hold in my hand a number of catalogues issued by these firms, containing a statement of the contents of each remedy they manufacture. Some of these firms have been practicing this policy for a number of years, and they have found it to their best interest to do so. I have letters from them giving the reasons why they give to the world the benefit of knowing the composition of their medicines, and their reasons are both laudable and humane. No reputable manufacturer of medicines need fear in the least the provisions of this bill.

The Journal of the American Medical Association some time ago said:

Whatever is secret is suspicious, and this axiom applies especially to medicines that are secret in character. One reason for the success of secret nostrums lies in the fact that extravagant claims are made for them, which on their face would be ridiculous in the extreme if their true composition were known. Remove the mystery surrounding these preparations and their wonderful virtues would vanish.

The Druggists' Circular, in discussing this subject of secret nostrums, recently said:

A worthy article is able to stand upon its own merits and courts the light. There is absolutely no rational defense that can be advanced in opposition to having the label of a medicine tell its composition. There are many weighty reasons that can be advanced in defense of such a proposal. Secrecy is a respectable cloak for falsehood, extortion, and conditions that degrade. It is darkness pure and simple, and none love it unless their deeds require its covering.

Mr. Chairman, there are about 50,000 different kinds of proprietary or patent medicines and nostrums manufactured and sold in the United States, for which the public pays annually about $90,000,000. There are three general classes of these medicines; first being the, strictly speaking, patent medicines, which are medicines covered by the granting of a patent for it by the United States. The earliest patented medicine was called "Worm Destroying Medicine," and the patent for this medicine was issued in 1837. Castoria, one of the most widely known and sold medicines in the world, was patented in 1868, and ever since that time the exact composition of that medicine has been known to the public. It is, nevertheless, one of the most universally used medicines and has no successful competitor in its field, which shows that counterfeits are not successful, and manufacturers need not fear them.

The second class of medicines are called proprietary remedies. These are manufactured largely by the large firms whose names I have given previously. These medicines are generally of recognized merit, and their contents, or ingredients, are usually known, and of late years their composition, or formula, is almost universally given to the public by the manufacturer. These medicines, as their composition or formula or contents are generally known to the physicians of the United States, are often prescribed by physicians for their patients. The manufacturers of strictly patented medicines can have little or no objection to this bill, for their formulas are largely known to the public. The manufacturers of proprietary medicines can have little or no objection to this bill, for nearly all of the manufacturers of such medicines are now not only giving the contents of their medicines, but also, in many instances, the proportions of the ingredients in the same—in other words, their formula.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a class of manufacturers who may object to the passage of this bill. These are the manufacturers of the third class of medicines, known as "nostrums," whose ingredients and composition are carefully concealed from the public and kept secret, and whose value depends largely upon the widely distributed advertising literature, and whose sale depends largely upon the extravagant promises of cure held out to an unsuspecting public. These medicines are usually covered by a trade-mark instead of a patent. The greatest danger to the public lies in the use of these nostrums. It is said that there are something like 5,000,000 people in the United States who buy these various medicines, whose advertising literature appeals to their credulity and their hope. A large number of such people every year become drug habitues, or morphine, cocaine, or opium fiends. A large proportion of such nostrums contain alcohol or some narcotic like opium, morphine, cocaine, chloral, eucaine, or some latter-day synthetic nerve stimulant. I culled the following from the Ladies' Home Journal, of Philadelphia, which is a clear statement of how this habit of taking these pernicious medicines is contracted:

Every year, particularly in the springtime, tens of thousands of bottles of patent medicines are used throughout the country by persons who are in absolute ignorance of what they are swallowing. They feel "sluggish" after the all-winter, indoor confinement; they feel that their systems need a toning up or a "blood purifier." Their eye catches some advertisement in a newspaper, or on a fence, or on the side of a barn, and from the cleverly worded description of symptoms they are convinced that this man's "bitters," or that man's "sarsaparilla," or that doctor's (?) vegetable compound, or So-and-so's "pills" is exactly the thing they need as a "tonic." "No use going to a doctor," argue these folks, "we can save that money," and instead of paying one or two dollars for honest, intelligent advice they invest from 25 to 75 cents for a bottle of this or a box of that. And what do they buy—and what do they put into their systems? Few know. Fewer realize the absolute damage they are working upon themselves and their households. For the sake of saving a physician's fee they pour into their mouths and into their systems a quantity of unknown drugs which have in them percentages of alcohol, cocaine, and opium that are absolutely alarming. A mother who would hold up her hands in holy horror at the thought of her child drinking a glass of beer, which contains from 2 to 5 per cent of alcohol, gives to that child with her own hands a patent medicine that contains from 17 to 44 per cent of alcohol, to say nothing of opium and cocaine. I have seen a temperance woman, who raged at the thought of whisky, take bottle after bottle of some "bitters" which contained five times as much alcohol—and compared to which sherry, port, claret, and champagne were as harmless as the pink lemonade at Sunday school picnics. It is not by any means putting the matter too strongly to say that the patent-medicine habit is one of the gravest curses, with the most dangerous results, that is inflicting our American national life. Sooner or later the people of America must awaken to the fearful dangers that lie in these proprietary preparations. The mothers of our children in particular must have their eyes opened to the dangers that lurk in these patent medicines. Here and there a hopeful sign of an awakening is seen. Slowly but surely the best magazines are falling into line in their refusal to accept patent-medicine advertisements of any kind. Not long ago one of the insurance companies made an excellent move by requiring its medical examiner to ask of each subject of insurance, "What patent medicines have you used during the last five years?" and gradually other insurance companies are realizing the fact that the use of patent medicines is even more injurious than the use of alcoholic liquors. But much still remains; more should be done. Public interest must be more widely aroused.

Every year we see in the newspapers and recorded in the medical journals many fatalities caused by taking these dan-
